Mr. Speaker, I hope we will be guided by the mistakes of the past. I know the President is doing all he possibly can to maintain peace in the world; the American people do not want war, and above all else, the Members of Congress do not want war.

In my concluding remarks I wish to quote the remarks of the late George Cardinal Mundelein, archbishop of Chicago, delivered by the Most Reverend Bernard D. Shiel, D. D., auxiliary bishop of Chicago, over the National Broadcasting Co.'s network on the evening of October 2, 1939, referring to America's Catholic youth and Europe's war:

Thank God for our spiritual tradition of mutual tolerance.

But thank God most of all that in these crucial revolutionary years in Europe we have had the matchless political leadership in foreign affairs of President Roosevelt.

To have lived through a few months of Europe is to have known as never before what a precious thing that gift of political leadership is. This tragedy of miserable common peoples, helpless and hopeless to know where their leaders are taking them or what to do about it, is not a tragedy of the natural gifts which God has given to Europe. It is a tragedy of human leaders who, blinded by their materialism and their conscious or unconscious selfishness, have over a whole generation, in every country, committed a crime of false stewardship against humanity and against God.

For the materialistic philosophy of political diehards, morally and intellectually bankrupt, an entire continent is to pay the price of moral and material anarchy.

In the face of all the teachings of Christianity, those diehards in all European nations were determined to prolong or achieve the exploitation of others.

The end result has been the unconscious instigation of a merciless revolutionary movement, which, like all great revolutions in history, will feed on itself and burn blindly on until it has burned itself out.

Mr. Speaker, by enacting a law proposed by the Senate bill, within our legal rights as universally recognized, we will enact a law which will more likely keep us out of war, and put us on the side of humanity and civilization, for civilization seems to be the one object of destruction by the totalitarian states of Europe.

The American School Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENT E. KELLER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the permission granted me by the unanimous consent of the House of Representatives, I take great pleasure in inserting the bill "to establish and maintain the American school army, and to organize and equip the American Reserve Army," together with as full a statement as possible concerning the idea, its inception, development, and action thereupon.

This statement may aid somewhat in setting forth the broader objects sought by the bill, which are difficult to inject into a legislative measure.

A bill to establish and maintain the American school army, and to organize and equip the American Reserve Army

Be it enacted, etc., That annually on the first Monday in April, or as soon thereafter as may be, the President of the United States shall issue a proclamation calling for 21,850 volunteers for enlistment in the American school army to serve actively for a period of 3 years and as reservists for a further period of 20 years.

This proclamation shall set out the number of volunteers for each congressional district, the qualifications of volunteers, the services to be rendered by them, and the advantages to be derived from the service. It shall state how, when, and where volunteers' applications and general information may be obtained.

Copies of this proclamation shall be posted in every post office and upon every rural free delivery route, and upon every free mail delivery route in cities throughout the United States, and in addition thereto such other publicity shall be given as may be found necessary to make the proclamation of general knowledge.

SEC. 2. That right to enlist as volunteers shall be apportioned in equal numbers to each congressional district throughout the United States, and States having the right to representation at large in Congress shall be considered as extraterritorial districts and shall have the right to the same number of volunteers for each Representative at Large to which it is entitled as are the regular congressional districts. The District of Columbia shall, for the purposes of this act, be considered as two congressional districts.

SEC. 3. That proper blanks for the use of volunteers in offering to enlist, to be known as volunteers' applications, and all necessary general information shall be printed by the Secretary of War and be placed in the hands of each postmaster for free distribution upon written application and to be sent in official free envelopes to any applicant within the official jurisdiction of his post office, and to be delivered free upon oral request at each post office. With each volunteer's application there shall be furnished a proper envelope addressed to the Secretary of War for the transmission of the volunteer's application.

SEC. 4. That volunteers shall be males between the ages of 15 and 18 years, morally clean and of good repute, physically without defect which military training and methodical living may not reasonably be expected to correct, of sound mind and ordinary intelligence: Provided, however, That no educational test shall be required.

SEC. 5. That volunteers' applications shall set out clearly the name, address, and age of the volunteer and the number of the congressional district in which he resides. It shall contain a provision giving the consent of the parents or parent or guardian to the enlistment of the volunteer, which shall be signed and witnessed. If neither parent is living and no guardian has been appointed, this fact shall be so shown and no "consent" shall be required. The volunteer's application shall be signed by two householders who vouch for the honesty and good character of the applicant, their addresses being given. The volunteers' applications shall be mailed to the Secretary of War within 60 days from the date of the proclamation.

SEC. 6. That upon receipt of these volunteers' applications the Secretary of War shall cause to be issued to each volunteer a permit for examination which shall set forth the places and dates within the congressional district in which each volunteer resides, where and when the examinations for admission into the American school army shall be held.

SEC. 7. That within 15 days of the close of the period for volunteering the Secretary of War shall cause to be issued a statement showing the number of volunteers by States and the congressional districts thereof, with the number apportioned to each.

SEC. 8. That a board of examiners to consist of one Regular Army officer, who shall be ex officio chairman of the board, two physicians, and two citizens interested in education shall be appointed for each congressional district. No member of the board of examiners shall be a resident or a former resident of the district for which he is appointed.

SEC. 9. That the board of examiners shall repair to the points where the volunteers have been directed to assemble on the days specified, and conduct an examination of each volunteer presenting a permit for examination under the qualifications provided for in this act.

SEC. 10. That all volunteers who are found qualified shall receive a certificate of acceptance from the board of examiners properly signed by them. All permits for examination shall be signed by the board of examiners showing the acceptance or rejection of the holder and shall be returned to the Secretary of War.

SEC. 11. That upon completion of all examinations in each congressional district, if the number accepted be equal or less than the number apportioned to the district, then all who have been accepted shall receive certificates for enlistment.

SEC. 12. That if upon completion of examination of all volunteers in any congressional district it be found that the number accepted exceeds the number apportioned to the district, then the board of examiners, in public view, shall cause the names of all those accepted to be written separately on slips of paper which shall be placed in unmarked opaque envelopes and the whole number of envelopes shall be thoroughly mixed in a proper receptacle, and a child blindfolded shall draw forth one envelope at a time until a number equal to the number apportioned to the district be drawn.

The envelopes drawn out shall then be opened and the names of those found therein shall receive certificates for enlistment.

SEC. 13. That if any congressional district, or districts, in any State fail to provide their apportionment, then the names of all accepted volunteers within the State who have not been awarded certificates of enlistment shall be prepared and drawn by the method provided in section 12.

SEC. 14. That in States having Representatives at large all the names of accepted volunteers within the State who have not been awarded certificates of enlistment shall be prepared and drawn by the method provided in section 12.

SEC. 15. That if any State or States fail to provide its full apportionment, then the names of all accepted volunteers from all States who have not been awarded certificates of enlistment shall be prepared and drawn by the method provided in section 12.

SEC. 16. That in case of permanent disability, or dismissal during the first 3 months of enlistment, the unit from which the cadet came shall be drawn upon for a substitute, provided there be any volunteer holding a certificate of acceptance; if not, then the next larger unit, until a substitute be drawn. For all who, for any reason, leave the service before the next annual drawing substitutes shall be drawn as a part of the regular apportionment for the next year.

SEC. 17. That certificates for enlistment shall entitle the holders to enlistment in the American school army.

SEC. 18. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to provide proper school camps for the American school army, using such Army posts, reservations, and military tracts already owned by the United States as may be suited to the requirements of the American school army, by addition thereto, by lease, or purchase, or by leasing or purchasing new sites.

SEC. 19. That the Secretary of War shall cause to be made proper plans for the mobilization of all volunteers to whom certificates of enlistment have been issued into such school camps as may be necessary for the military and educational instruction contemplated in this act. In this grouping into camps volunteers shall be so assigned as to thoroughly mix them into a nationally homogeneous whole, insofar as may be.

SEC. 20. That the volunteers shall be assigned to military units, and an oath of allegiance and service administered pledging each to obey all rules and regulations promulgated for the American school army, to practice good morals, to study, drill, and work diligently for 3 years, and at the end of that time to become military Reservists, subject to military duty for a further period of 20 years. After taking this oath they shall be designated as cadets.

SEC. 21. That the Secretary of War shall furnish necessary uniforms, clothing, subsistence, arms, and accouterments for military training, tents, and camp equipage.

SEC. 22. That cadets shall devote 3 hours per day to military training, physical education, sanitation, and prevention of disease.

SEC. 23. That the cadets shall live under the military discipline usual in Regular Army camps, so far as the same may be applicable to the objects sought in this act. They shall do and perform any and all labor necessary to self-sustained camp life.

SEC. 24. That a careful record of grades shall be kept so as to show the military efficiency and qualifications for military leadership of each cadet, and the special aptitude for technical development along constructive lines of engineering.

SEC. 25. That the Vocational Board shall consist, ex-officio, of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Labor, and the Commissioner of Education, and shall have full power over the education, vocational training, and vocational labor of the cadets. The Vocational Board shall have the power to employ civilian teachers, lecturers, demonstrators, and assistants. It shall be the duty of the Vocational Board to provide proper curriculum, to the end that every cadet shall at graduation be industrially self-sustaining and thoroughly proficient in at least one vocation. The school year shall be 9 months in length.

SEC. 25. That the vocational earnings shall be put into a common fund and be distributed equally to all cadets of the same class or year's enlistment under the direction of the Vocational Board. Out of the common fund of the school army the Vocational Board shall apportion equally to all cadets of the same class or year a sum for incidental expense not to exceed $1 per week to each cadet.

SEC. 27. That in cases where there are relatives dependent upon the labor of cadets it shall be the duty of the Vocational Board to ascertain that fact and to ascertain the net cash value of the services of the cadet to the dependents and cause to be remitted that amount to the dependents every 3 months thereafter until the end of the active service of the cadet.

SEC. 28. That it shall be the duty of the Vocational Board to cause to be kept a careful system of grades indicating the proficiency in general and vocational education and training. The completion of the 3 years of active service shall be known as graduation, and every graduate shall receive a certificate setting out his grades and his military classification for Reserve Army and Volunteer Service.

SEC. 29. That the War and Navy Departments shall jointly publish or cause to be published monthly a journal on military and naval affairs, which journal shall be sent free to all Reservists during their full Reserve period of 20 years.

SEC. 30. That the oath of allegiance and service shall be held to have removed every disability as to the American citizenship which might have existed, and no declaration or naturalization or other act shall be necessary to full citizenship upon the cadet arriving at his majority.

SEC. 31. That upon reaching proficiency in any vocation any cadet may, after his first year's active service, provided vacancy exists, be transferred to the Navy for the remainder of his active service, and thereafter shall be a naval reserve for a period of 20 years.

SEC. 32. That at graduation every cadet shall be a Reservist for a period of 20 years, and shall be subject to bear arms in the service of the United States. He shall, during his Reserve period, be subject to the regulations applicable to Reservists.

SEC. 33. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to make all necessary and appropriate regulations.

SEC. 34. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to in any way, directly or indirectly, defraud, cheat, or deceive, for the purpose of preventing the carrying out of the provisions of this act, and whoever shall so do shall be guilty of conspiracy.

SEC. 35. That any dishonesty, indecency, or immorality on the part of any cadet shall be cause for dismissal without honor.

SEC. 36. That the War Department shall furnish list of cadets upon enlistment, notifications of dismissals, resignations and deaths of cadets, and the names of graduation of all Reservists to all postmasters from whose territory they originally came. It shall be the duty of postmasters to keep permanent records of this information and to furnish such information as may be required of them by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 37. That at the end of the school year the American school army shall, for a period of 3 months, engage in general military maneuvers under the direction of the Secretary of War.

SEC. 38. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to provide for the proper grouping of reservists into military units, to assign reservists into given units, to provide proper arms and equipment for each unit as formed, and to prepare plans for mobilization.

SEC. 39. That at the graduation of cadets it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to select from those cadets whose grades indicate the highest qualification for military leadership and the greatest technical ability along engineering lines such number, according to grades, as may be deemed necessary for higher positions of command, and these shall be permitted to enter West Point Military Academy, or such other military or technical institution as may be designated by the Secretary of War, under the same conditions and with the same rights and privileges as other appointees to West Point may have.

SEC. 40. That the necessary appropriations for carrying out the provisions of this act, to be determined from estimates by the Secretary of War, are hereby made out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

My 5 years of military training under West Point graduates—2 years of it under Maj. Gen. J. F. Bell, who became Chief of Staff of the United States Army—made it my particular interest while studying at Heidelberg to observe the methods of the German officers in training their great reserve armies. I made it a point to associate much with the young officers and induced them to discuss their work. When I felt I had absorbed all that they had to give, I made it a point to associate with the petit officers and the privates under training. I found that the training of these latter continued for 2 years for infantry and 3 years for cavalry and artillery; that this training is intensive from the beginning to the end of those periods. The soldier is given no time for any mental development and precious little for recreation. But he is kept at a constant grind, drilling and working at purely military problems. By that method he is made into a very perfect machine, but without the mental development which in my judgment and observation might be given to him during this time without impairing his military fitness.

Anyone who has seen the 3-year men at West Point drill, knows that no soldiers in the world can excel them in pure military exercises; nor can I believe that any soldier under any European reserve system can approach them in intelligence. Our West Pointers spend not exceeding 2 hours a day on actual drill, and spend the rest of their time in proper study and recreation.

I therefore conceived the idea that a proper combination of physical and military training, study, and recreation, proportioned along the lines of West Point training, over a period of 3 years, would build men and would produce an organization equal in physical training and far superior in mental grasp to any European reserve army. I therefore wrote out that idea. These writings afterward became a series of articles on the subject of The American School Army.

In 1907, on a visit to my teacher, Maj. Gen. J. F. Bell, then Chief of Staff of the United States Army, I laid this plan before him. He insisted very strongly that I offer the article for publication at once, to which I replied that it had been my observation that America would prepare for war only in the actual presence of war and since that was an era of profound peace, I did not believe that there would be any reaction to the proposition at that time.

But on November 20, 1915, Harpers Weekly published The American School Army with a broad editorial heading, and with a dramatic illustration of the idea. Immediately letters began coming to me from all of the United States and a few foreign countries. Ex-President Theodore Roosevelt wrote very powerfully endorsing the idea.

President Wilson referred to the article many times in his western campaign for preparedness during the early months of 1916 as the "long look ahead for American preparedness."

The State Senate of Illinois, of which I was a member at that time, passed a resolution—Senate Resolution No. 16, second special session Forty-ninth General Assembly of Illinois—calling the attention of the Congress to the idea. It was a part of an editorial from Harpers Weekly under date of March 11, 1916, printed on page 247:

DEFENSE

The great fear about the defense program is that too much reliance may be made on a State militia, with incomplete federalization, and a bill passed with no sufficient provision for a first line of reserves. A measure has been prepared that has a great deal of intelligence, but it is probably too novel to have much chance in a piece of rush legislation. We quote from the proceedings of the Illinois State Senate, January 21, 1916:

"Whereas the question of preparedness for the national defense has become and is a vital issue in our country; before final determination of the appropriate policies the question should receive the most careful and exhaustive consideration. Only the most meritorious plan should be adopted. Among other well-considered plans is one which has been suggested by an able member of this body, the Honorable KENT E. KELLER, of Ava, Ill., whose well-founded views were admirably set forth in an article entitled 'An American School Army,' which article was published in a recent issue of Harpers Weekly and elicited unusual interest throughout the country; and

"Whereas, together with the other plans suggested by students of the question, this plan should be considered by the National Congress; believing this admirable plan should receive, as well it merits, the careful consideration of the Federal Congress: Be it

"Resolve, therefore, That, anxious to have the best plan adopted, and with that sole end in view, we beg to call the attention of the members of the National Congress to the article in question and most respectfully solicit its careful consideration."

Congressman KELLER is now in Washington working at the idea, and he it was who drew the bill to which we have already referred. As it will be inconvenient for Members of Congress and for readers in general to get at Congressman KELLER'S article in our issue of November 20, 1915, and as the present emergency is so great, we shall reprint it in our issue of next week.

In February 1916 I met Senator George Earle Chamberlain, of Oregon, then chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, whose attention had been called to the article in Harpers Weekly. He asked me to draft a bill providing for the mechanics to put this idea into practice. This I did. The bill was introduced by Senator Robert R. Owen, of Oklahoma, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I have quoted this bill because it expresses the fundamentals very clearly. Our entrance in the World War—1917—bringing the necessity for quick action, prevented proper consideration and hearings on the bill at that time.

Senator Owen reintroduced this bill in 1928, because he believed it the one best method of providing an army for the people of the United States.

At the request of Editor Norman Hapgood, of Harpers Weekly, I wrote another article on this subject, which was published in two installments. And I am here in this statement quoting the essential points as I wrote them in those articles. With intelligent observation of what is happening in the world at the present time, it seems to me that the United States ought now to be willing to take up earnestly, and work out carefully, a thorough-going system that will in due course provide 2,000,000 thoroughly trained, thoroughly educated American soldiers ready on call.

Because of the great importance that Mr. Hapgood and his editorial staff attributed to this plan for the American school army, he reprinted the original article in March. On May 6 and May 13 the two installments of the second article appeared. It must be borne in mind that, although these articles were written during the World War, there are so many references that are apropos at the present time that I have not seen fit to change the original, but quote those parts which still give a clear picture of the entire idea.

In the consideration of the American school army, it must be held constantly and powerfully in mind that the entry into the American school army is entirely voluntary. It is not enforced military service; it imposes no additional obligation on the part of the man so trained for military service when called upon above that which every man already has to serve when called, whether trained or not.

[From Harper's Weekly of November 20, 1915, p. 484]

AN AMERICAN SCHOOL ARMY

(By KENT E. KELLER)

It can only be hoped that now, while the necessity for a defensive army is clear to the very great majority of Americans, we may develop some rational system for providing and maintaining one. It must not be an army founded on present emergencies, but one that will justify its existence and continuance even throughout the long years of peace to come. If we are to have an army, it must be an American army in every sense of the word. It must be the most efficient army in the world. Its organization and maintenance must be in harmony with our best traditions and highest ideals of liberty and equality. It must appeal to the common sense of the people generally as not only an efficient weapon of defense, but as well an army beneficial to the country in time of peace; an army around which the Nation can grow without any of the fears which our ancestors had about large standing armies.

Sufficient preparedness to defend ourselves against attack appears to be a prime necessity under present world development, because the same reason which induced European nations to make war on one another will lead them to make war on us if they think they can win. How to prepare most effectively and at the least cost in money and the least loss of industrial energy is the question. An army we may form must be and remain a volunteer army. No form of conscription will be found necessary, nor would be tolerated. We must not adopt bodily some system from some other country that may appear excellent for that country, but that has not been tried out in actual warfare. We ought rather to originate some plan of our own, suited to our own conditions, the fundamental principles of which have been thoroughly well proven in actual conflict of arms.

An army is a development. To be a soldier is to have made a growth. Soldiering today is a business which requires thorough preparation. It is not founded on patriotism and enthusiasm alone. The technique of soldiering reaches to almost every branch of science today, and in the future this tendency will be greatly extended. The soldier who does not know his duties and know well how to perform them in conjunction with his comrades may, in case of a conflict, be in the way rather than helpful against a well-trained enemy. It is easy enough to get shot for one's country. It is difficult to shoot the enemies of one's country and live.

Military drill a few minutes each week in schools; a few weeks' outing in summer camps; a businessmen's army league to drill when they can spare a little time; a 3-weeks' militia encampment, with occasional evenings at drill between times; a summer school for officers that can neither make actual officers of them nor soldiers of the boys back home; and all the other kindred attempts at soldiering are good and inspiring in many ways. But a little study of the European conflict will show any thoughtful man what a grim and terrible thing warfare is, and that it is impossible to prepare for it too well. We must face the matter with open eyes at least. And it is no less than the truth to say that to send these fine, courageous militia boys, these enthusiastically patriotic summer soldiers, against 3-year men would be little better than murder. Only 3-year men can meet 3-year men on equal terms.

Germany required the men who are making these astounding drives to serve, working 2 years constantly in the infantry and 3 years in the cavalry and artillery. France tried out a shorter time of service for her soldiers to her heart's content. She was compelled to admit the inferiority of these short-service men and adopted the same period of service as the Germans. A short period would not do. A shorter period of service will not make soldiers of Americans. We must see this plainly or suffer dearly for our folly if the test ever comes. The necessity for this long preparation is fully understood and appreciated by all military men. It must also be fully accepted by the people of this country generally before we can have a real army. The hope that any makeshift will do ought not to be indulged in at all in any quarter. To rely on summer soldiers is to court disaster. It is training that makes the soldier; it is training that makes the officer—plenty of training and plenty of time. It takes trained soldiers and trained officers both to make an army.

West Point takes plain American boys with only fair education, without any proof of soldierly qualities, aptitude for war, or native ability to command, and in 4 years' constant training and educating hammers them not only into soldiers of the first class but into officers and gentlemen—commanders and leaders of soldiers—the equal of any military men in the world.

The plan here offered to meet our requirements makes no pretensions to completeness. It is set out, rather, as a basis for discussion in the hope that rational direction may be given the present general desire for some adequate means of national defense.

THE PLAN

1. Let 100,000 boys between the ages of 16 and 18, apportioned among the States, volunteer each year into the American school army for a period of 3 years.

2. Let these devote from 2 to 3 hours (about the time used in West Point) daily to military drill, army exercises, study of military science, and physical training and education, including sanitation, prevention of disease, and like broad general information.

3. The remaining time to be devoted to study along general educational lines, devoting especial attention to agriculture, manual training, and the useful arts, trades, and sciences that are best adapted to fitting men for the practical work of life.

4. These boys to live constantly under the strictest military discipline, and to maintain a standard of morals equal to the best secular military schools.

5. The United States to pay all costs of maintenance, food, clothing, instruction, medical attendance, and a small allowance for "spending money." The boys themselves to do all the labor of every kind and character, the same as soldiers do under conditions of war. This will not only train them in actual soldiering but the expense of maintenance will be so low that the number suggested in this plan will prove no burden to the country.

6. The boys, in return for this 3 years of schooling and methodical growth, are, upon graduation, to become reservists for a period of 20 years, subject to call to the colors, classified so as to let the oldest be callest last in case of war.

7. These schools should be distributed in large units, probably not less than 10,000 in a unit, in localities best suited to their work. The school should continue for the ordinary school year. Then for 10 weeks the boys should break camp and march under the usual conditions of war to central points where large armies should meet for the maneuver. This would give the officers every opportunity to learn the handling, moving, and supplying of large bodies of soldiers. It would give the men every experience in actual soldiering under all the conditions of war. It was these great maneuvers that perfected both the European men and officers for these immense strategic moves.

8. In this school army leadership would be encouraged among the men from the very beginning. The natural leaders would come to the front. They would, of course, supply their own officers for this school army, as well as grade and classify for future use all who aspired to leadership. At graduation, from among those who had shown the best leadership and fitness for command and for special technical service would be selected as many as should be required for higher officers. These ablest men—these strongest natural leaders—would be sent for 4 years to a greater West Point, or West Points, where they would very certainly develop into the world's best military men.

9. The Government would establish an Army and Navy Journal for the use of all Army and Navy men. After graduation, all the men would receive this paper free during the entire 20 years wherever they went. The journal would keep every reservist constantly in touch with military and naval development all over the world. Their training and experience would enable them to at once understand and use intelligently every new invention or method of warfare in case war was thrust upon us. It would make American reservists the most intelligent in the world. It would stimulate inventive genius among a vast number of trained, resourceful men. It would keep up interest, encourage individual growth, and aid team intelligence.

10. This system would result in giving the United States 2,000,000 men constantly ready, the best trained, the most intelligent and resourceful soldiers in the world; not machines, but men who would grow as military invention and practice grow. It would put us in position to say to all nations, "We will do no wrong; we will suffer no wrong."

From this school army idea would naturally develop an American school navy system, either as an independent or coordinate establishment, as should be found most practicable.

Aside from military purposes, this school army system would give the country each year 100,000 graduates in usefulness. It would offer to every boy, who had for any reason been denied an education, an opportunity for 3 years of the best schooling possible. It would set a physical standard for all American men outside the school army as well as in it. This would lead ultimately to an American ideal of physical manhood, so much needed and so much neglected.

Every locality would get back some boy grown to inspiring manhood, skilled in industry, schooled in patriotism, able to think, clean, knowing sanitation for himself and for his community; the making of a broad-gaged American whom his country had educated and who would owe his best service to his country—fit to father the coming race of better men.

The thorough mixing in the school army of these boys from all the various States and sections of the country would nationalize the school and through it the Nation. The hyphen would disappear from our citizenship as naturally as ripened leaves fall to give place to a newer growth.

This school army system would stimulate and make permanent the heroic American man. It would let us hark back to the simple Spartan life. It would recognize the real, the necessary. It would make efficiency the natural thing. The reservists would know the reason for obedience to law, which our young men today do not know, and which our schools do not teach. The total lack of system is the thought of our youth—the resulting chaos of mind and act would of necessity give way to the methodical competition of these efficient reservists.

The system would make organization of industry in the broadest sense a part of our natural development, a thing now quite impossible. The young men who spend 3 years in this school army will be further along industrially, 3 years after his graduation, than if he had spent the whole 6 years in industry without the training. For all the years to follow he would do proportionately as well, whether working for himself or some one else. This training would always, because of his largely increased intelligence, open many doors of opportunity to him which without it would have remained closed.

None of the plans to form an army of adult citizens is feasible, simply because no sufficiently large body of full-grown Americans will ever consent to the conditions of army life for the length of time necessary to form an efficient army, except in the immediate presence of war.

There would be no waste in the school army. It would simply be taking boys before they are ready for industry and using the intervening time to educate and fit them for better service, at the same time making soldiers of them. This saving of the wages of the adults and the enormous gains in efficiency of the school army reservists are most important considerations. It is easy for boys to adapt themselves to the discipline of military life—it is difficult for men.

There would be no lack of volunteers for this school army. With strict moral discipline most parents would want their boys to have the training, and most boys would certainly want the experience and growth.

There would always be an abundance of reservists at graduation willing and ready to join the Regular Army to keep that branch of the service splendidly fitted for doing its great work.

And, not the least among the advantages to be gained, these reservists who had studied and drilled and soldiered for 3 years, and marched and maneuvered in great armies, would not only furnish officers for their own body of reservists, but would abundantly supply the very best officers for all the lower grades, at least for as many volunteer soldiers as the country could procure in case of such dire necessity.

Editorial head of this article is as follows: "The problem of national defense will attract more attention during this fall and winter (1916) than any other question before Congress. Enlightened and responsible discussion of it is therefore necessary. The following article by an Illinois State senator seems to us to contain points of very real interest."

AN AMERICAN SCHOOL ARMY

(By KENT E. KELLER)

And now arises a situation in which we think public education will be increased by the reprinting of a more recent article. When President Wilson was touring the West, talking about preparedness, he quoted an article that appeared in Harpers Weekly on November 20. Last week we quoted a resolution from the Illinois Senate referring to this same article, and asking the United States Congress to give attention to the plan therein proposed. The question of preparedness being so urgent at the present moment, and this article making such a significant contribution, we have felt that to Congressmen and the public it ought to be made easily accessible.

In Harpers Weekly of May 6, beginning page 489, the following article occurred with the title and editorial head as follows:

AN AMERICAN SCHOOL ARMY—BY KENT E. KELLER

In our issue of November 20 we published an article on preparedness by Mr. KELLER, Illinois State senator, which has since received wide attention. The question of preparedness being so urgent at the present moment we are glad to present this amplification of Mr. KELLER's plan.

This is the first installment of the second article:

There is no such thing as a regular army in any of the countries of Europe except England. France, Germany, Russia, and all the rest have studied war and made war for many, many years. Their long experience has enabled them to reduce it to a science. They know what it takes to make the best soldier and the best army. The enormous cost of their wars has compelled the most careful investigation into the economy of making and up-keeping their armies.

It was observed that any effective veteran soldier after leaving the army and entering into the ordinary industries for long periods, even 20 or 30 years, could take up arms and in a very short time enter into the soldier's life and again be an effective fighter.

The length of time necessary for making a permanently effective soldier was noted carefully and discussed fully for many years in all those countries. This element of time meant millions of money. Financial necessity compelled the time to be reduced to the very minimum without loss in efficiency. It was finally learned that 2 years is the shortest time in which average men can become really efficient soldiers.

The conclusion was inevitable that to thoroughly train men for 2 years and class them as reservists, soldiers subject to call, is far the cheapest method of creating and maintaining an efficient army. All the fighting is being done by these carefully trained reservists, and all the countries of Europe, except England, follow this plan. Her foreign possessions seemed to justify her regular army, but apparently influenced her to neglect the other and more economical one.

To provide an efficient defensive army is the national program. It is a great undertaking and deserves thorough consideration. It should not be done as rush legislation. It is new and offers the opportunity of a generation in constructive thought. To begin right will be to serve greatly. To do less would be inexcusable folly.

Our strongest generals and the best military authorities all agree we need 2,000,000 men to make the United States safe against all attack. Congress should provide a plan looking toward securing that number at the earliest possible moment. That is not too many for so large a country as ours. If done economically the expense will not be burdensome to so rich a country. A less number would not constitute a rational defensive army.

All the experience necessary for our guidance is open to us. The principal lessons of the greatest war of history are before us. If we are willing to use this information, there is no room for any great mistakes.

We are to have an Army. That is settled. What kind of an Army it is to be is the matter in hand. Soldiers, officers, and equipment properly organized, constitute an army. Any one of these lacking, there is no army. Any one of these of poor quality will reduce the others to its own level of inefficiency. It takes the best soldiers, the best officers, and the best equipment—all three—to make up the best army. An army of thoroughly trained soldiers and officers properly equipped is superior to 10 times its number of poorly trained soldiers and inexperienced officers with insufficient or poor equipment. In no other line of human endeavor is complete preparedness so vitally necessary. In no other is thoroughness in every detail so absolutely essential. In war the highest efficiency means the greatest economy in its broadest possible sense.

Our Army-to-be must be equal or superior, man for man, to any army in the world all the time. If we are not to have that kind of an army it might be better to have none at all. For we may delude ourselves about our Army, but every other nation in the world will know exactly what we have and what it is really worth in fighting ability. A paper army will fool nobody but American citizens, and they are the ones who ought not to be deceived. The facts should be given to them without fear or favor.

The plain truth must be told about some present illusions: A soldier cannot be made by wishing it onto him. A commission and shoulder straps do not make an officer. Ninety-day men are not soldiers at all. Six-months men are not, either, no matter how "intensively" they may have been trained. One-year men as a class are not real soldiers. A few men are natural soldiers. One year's training will make these individually fit. But armies are made up of average men, and even these unusual ones would be much better soldiers with another year's training. If this is not true, why do the Germans train all their soldiers full 2 years?

If France could have matched these German soldiers with men drilling a few weeks or months, what sense would there have been in France drilling her men most diligently full 2 years, as the Germans do? There can be and is but one answer, and that is that out of the vast military experience of all the European countries it has been made plain that no less a period than 2 years is sufficient for training an army for real warfare.

The nations which did not know enough to give their soldiers 2 years' training are having to learn the necessity of it at an awful cost.

Now, what must we conclude from all this? That we cannot prepare after we are attacked. We have no neighbor behind whose skirts we can hide till we drill for 2 years. We certainly must see that our own soldiers to be equal to the best must have training equal to theirs. It takes just as much time, as much training, and as good equipment to make an effective soldier of an American as it does of a German, Frenchman, or Englishman. The men who think at all must see this. The legislator who does not grasp this point clearly is not capable of suggesting adequate legislation, because this is the very heart of the matter.

The idea that Americans "can lick all creation," just because they are Americans; that they are so much braver and smarter than anybody else; that because we "licked the Injuns" we are unbeatable and so on to the end of the chapter, ought to be laid tenderly away with the other things of childhood. We should see that we have no monopoly of patriotism and courage. All the European armies are showing a loyalty that has never been excelled. They are displaying as great bravery as any men who ever gave battle. The reservists of all the countries are doing as good fighting as any men of any time. The marvels of military achievement ought to stir us into seeing what veritable babes in arms we are, and what a vast way we must go in preparation before we could defend our country against such onslaughts.

There are at the present time three bills before Congress representing three distinct military systems. The Hay militia pay bill, to nationalize the militia; the Chamberlain bill to reorganize and enlarge the Regular Army, and the Owen bill "to establish and maintain the American school army, and to organize and equip the American Reserve Army." The provisions of the first two bills have been fully discussed in the public press.

The Hay militia pay bill is in many regards an excellent measure. If the nonessentials are carefully eliminated, it will probably do as much for the improvement of the militia as the natural limitations of the militia system will permit. If the provisions of the Hay bill are lived up to requiring physical fitness of the men, thorough instruction of the officers, rigid compliance with the requirements for drill and the general improvement in the quality of training, it will greatly benefit the militia. If these things are not done the pay will be thrown away, though pay is proper and just if the militia is to be used nationally. If these requirements are strictly enforced, however, it is very questionable whether the enlistments will greatly increase, as the organized militia officers assured the congressional committee it would do.

The one really great danger we are facing is that we are apt to get the notion that when we have 424,000 militia (if we ever do) that we shall then have a real army of that size. Nothing will be further from the truth, as every soldier knows, our own as well as those who might oppose us, and as everybody else may plainly see, for that matter. It is the time actually put in at soldiering that counts. Having a name on the company roll for 40 years won't make a soldier of a man.

There is excellent, fair, and poor militia, as militia goes. The militia is made up of men who are doing things in the world—busy, active men, who find a little time once in a while to do some military training. But they are not soldiers and never will be under the militia system, because they have not had and are not going to have the time for the training required to make soldiers of men. It is not fair to the militiaman to expect him to do what nobody else can do. And they very generally know this. It is only the perfervid politician hunting votes who can take a busy man, drill him 72 hours in broken doses, camp him out 2 weeks in summer, and hand him back to the American people a soldier who can "lick his weight in wildcats." Americanism ought to include common sense and common honesty.

As a means of making soldiers ready for instant use, the militia system is economically wasteful. But, properly organized, with all the men fit, it would, at the first sign of danger, go into training at once, and would be ready many months before a volunteer army. It would constitute a valuable second line of defense. This is its sphere of usefulness. It cannot rationally be considered for any other purpose in serious warfare. But that justifies its cost so long as a second line of defense shall be necessary.

The one necessity not met in either the Hay or Chamberlain bills is provided for in the Owen bill. The absolute necessity is a large reserve army of thoroughly trained soldiers. The Owen bill provides this. This bill, the first year, calls for 50 youths from each congressional district to enable the working out of the details of the system in practice. But as soon as this is done, it is contemplated to increase this number to 230 from each congressional district, or a total of 100,000 from the country at large, to enter and graduate each year after a 3 years' course.

The American school army system consists in education of the youth of our land along broad general lines, with especial attention to everyday practical living-making; at the same time it makes soldiers of them. The youths actually earn their way by being reservists for 20 years after graduation. It is a fair exchange, most advantageous to both them and the country.

The American school army plan goes on the idea that a youth from 15 to 18 years of age, who lives constantly under strict discipline 3 years; who shall drill and study military science from 2 to 3 hours a day every day in the school year, the same as at West Point, devoting the remaining time to education; who spends 3 months each summer in great army camps in drill and maneuvers as in actual war for 3 summers, or a total of 9 months; that such a young man will be the equal as a soldier of the French and Germans, who spend 2 years in military training without the education.

German and French reservists never come back for drill after their time is up. They are so thoroughly saturated with discipline and methodical thinking that they don't need it. They are always soldiers on call. The same would unquestionably be true of the American school army reservists at the end of 3 years' training.

In Harpers Weekly of May 13, page 530, there appeared the second installment of the second article:

(By KENT E. KELLER)

[The first installment of [State] Senator KELLER's article appeared in last week's issue.]

The American school army would in 23 years provide 2,000,000 reservists ready on call. These graduates in usefulness would be men any nation would be proud of. They would be in every walk of life, in every locality, engaged in the pursuits of peace, wanting to remain so, at home with their families, surely no menace to anyone except the foe who might want to attack us, but would not. And every dollar of our war money would be expended for education mostly on boys who need it sorely.

Now what will it cost? This is not only the natural question, but one that is of the substance of the thing. Because if any system is attempted which is not fundamentally right economically, it cannot be permanent. Any system which is wasteful should only be continued so long as necessity requires it, and until the economic—the efficient—can be substituted for it.

The nationalized militiamen under the Hay militia pay bill will cost the Federal Government $87 per year in addition to more than $50 per year for each man now expended by the States, communities, and individuals, or for each militiaman a total of $137 per year ($11,250,000 for 129,000 militiamen and to increase proportionally).

Under the provisions of the Chamberlain bill, each regular soldier costs $950 per year, a reduction of $50 under the present law.

The most careful investigation of costs in schools of agriculture, electrical, mechanical, and civil engineering, and the trades and general and industrial education has been made for the purpose of getting a reasonable estimate of the cost of each cadet of the American school army per year. The average for a 12-month period where uniforms and clothing are furnished is $411. But the head of one of the largest educational institutions in the country involving the total expense of students says, "The expense ought not to exceed $300 per year for each cadet, and no less than a full hundred thousand boys ought to be enlisted from the start." It is thought best, however, to allow $500 per year for 3 years, or $1,500 for the 3-year school period, so as to make the school of the highest standard. This will make the cost to the United States Government $65 per year for the American school army reservist, because he remains a reservist 20 years after graduation, or a total period of 23 years. It will be observed that in the militia, Regular Army, and American school army, the cost and service are both calculated from the day of enlistment. The cost of maintaining one regular soldier for a 23-year period is $21,850; one militiaman, $3,151; one school army reservist, $1,500.

The Regular soldier spends 12 months in training constantly under Army camp discipline. The nationalized militiaman spends half a month under like conditions and drills 72 hours during the remainder of the year, which may be fairly reckoned as equal to 2 more weeks of Regular Army training—or a total of 1 month actual training each year. A Regular Army soldier costs 6.9 times as much per year as a nationalized militiaman and spends approximately 12 times as much time in actual soldiering.

The Regular Army soldier costs 14.6 times as much per year as the American school army reservist and they are equal in efficiency.

The militiamen costs 2.1 times as much per year as the American school army reservist and compares in efficiency the same as the Regular.

Considered as a whole army for a 23-year period, we get a still clearer view of the matter.

Tabulation

COST PER MAN, 23-YEAR PERIOD

Regular Army man	$21,850
Nationalized militiaman	3,151
School army reservist	1,500

COST PER MAN PER YEAR

Regular Army man	950
School army reservist	65

COST PER ARMY, 23-YEAR PERIOD

Regular Army (178,000 men, 75,000 Reserves)	3,910,000,000
Nationalized militia (424,000 men, 100,000 reserves)	1,336,024,000
American school army (2,000,000 reservists, 300,000 cadets)	3,450,000,000

COST PER ARMY PER YEAR

Regular Army (178,000 men, 75,000 Reserves)	170,000,000
Nationalized militia (424,000 men, 100,000 reserves)	58,088,000
American school army (2,000,000 reservists, 300,000 cadets)	150,000,000

If at any given time all expenditures on our Military Establishment should cease, even under the Reserve provisions of the Hay and Chamberlain bills, at the end of 4 years there would not be a soldier left. But if this should occur under the American school army plan, at the end of 17 years we would still have a considerably larger and better Army than we now have.

It would be scientifically correct to charge half at least of the entire school-army cost to education, but it seems simpler to present that as a free gift to America, as no other country has it.

All this at first seems a staggering sum of money, and it is, but the United States is spending in this year—A. D. 1916—for purely educational purposes $900,000,000. This item will, at the present rate of increase, pass the billion-dollar mark in 1918. And with all, it is the best investment we are making. It is permanent.

The latest figures available from the Office of Education is that we spent $1,968,898,198 on public, elementary, and secondary schools in 1936.

There is much talk about educating officers for our Army. There is the same illusion about this that there is about the summer soldiers who are not soldiers. It seems to be the idea that if a student drills twice a week for a bare 45 minutes he is, upon graduation in academic studies, at once suspected of being an Army officer. It seems not to matter at all that this "officer" never pitched a tent, never saw an army, never saw an army camp, never heard a cannon, never fired an army rifle, never marched enough to get the wobble out of his legs, does not know what discipline means, is entirely innocent of sanitation, and has no idea of anything military beyond the most rudimentary company drill. A fitting officer he would be for the verdant summer soldier.

There are literally thousands upon thousands of youths in this country wanting an education, wanting to do something, but not knowing how to set about it. There are other thousands who have certain opportunities but will not accept what they have; they want action. There are other thousands and thousands who have partial opportunity but would embrace the chance of betterment with great enthusiasm. There are thousands who want a chance at being Army officers. There are two and three-quarter million boys in the United States between the ages of 15 and 18 years all the time. These boys are seldom fit for industry before they are 19 or 20, and never as a class. The years up to that time should be given to education and growth. From 15 to 18 is the empty space in the lives of boys. They who are idle suffer shamefully, and much of our crime starts here. The high school, from no faults of its own, holds only about 2 percent of them. This is the age when the love of adventure and romance is greatest. It is the plastic, formative time in which they are most easily directed along proper lines of growth. They long to do things.

Let Uncle Sam say, "Boys, here is your chance. Uncle Sam offers you 3 years of the best education and physical development to be had anywhere in the world, and it doesn't cost you a cent. You can get a good general education; you can learn any trade or calling you want to, under the best teachers and most practical conditions. If you make good, plenty of places will be waiting for you when you graduate. You will be able to make your way anywhere you go. You can hold down a job in the front ranks. You will have a fair chance to go to West Point and become an Army officer if you like that life. The door of opportunity is standing open to you. At the end of 3 years you will come out straight and upstanding as a West Pointer. You will be as good a soldier as walks the earth.

"Your obligation for all this is to take up arms for your country in case of war within 20 years of your graduation. But you are under this same obligation whether you are trained and educated in the American school army or not. So, do you want a good education, a fine healthy body, and the ability to be independent in the world—free?" And the volunteers would by far exceed the hundred thousand contemplated. And this is the solution of recruiting. Give the boys of America what they so much need and desire and they will fill the ranks to overflowing. It is the rational thing to do.

"Intensive training" talked about as a way of making soldiers quickly, is simply "speeding up." It is excusable only in the face of dire necessity. It is like the other speeding-up processes so righteously condemned in our industries. Our Army men must recognize this and know that the final results will not justify it. The whole idea that by any hocus-pocus a soldier can be "made while you wait," must be discarded as unworthy of serious consideration. We have the time and the money both to permit our soldiers to develop along right lines—to grow into soldiers. We cannot afford to rush. To make haste slowly, to persist along right lines, is our next national lesson. It is a good place to learn it in growing an army. The best army can only be made that way.

If it is objected that 23 years is a long time to wait for an army, let it be noted that our two present systems require 5 years for working out. That at the end of 10 years the American school army plan will provide more soldiers than the other two and of much higher efficiency, and if thought necessary, the number at any time may be increased.

So far the American school army has been considered purely on its merits as a military proposition. It is, as clearly demonstrated, by far the cheapest and most efficient army for this country purely as an army.

But its greatest importance lies in its enormous usefulness educationally. If it is adopted, it will be the most important addition to our vast general education ever made or possible to make at one time. Because our difficulty industrially lies just here. Our fathers very largely knew trades, and knew them exceedingly well. Our artisans, except machinists, today do not compare favorably with those of 50 years ago as to skill and artistry. Our fathers knew what we only half know, or know not at all. That is, that every man is better for knowing a trade, whether he uses it or not; that educating hands greatly helps to educate the brain. We arrived where we are in civilization by our hands. Our enormous natural wealth as a nation has enabled us to idle too much. It has paid better to exploit our resources than to labor. Idleness put on a paper collar and enticed us. We have forgotten how to work. We have got to learn again. We will be infinitely the better for it.

Senator Hoke Smith, of Georgia, asked unanimous consent for the printing of this article in the RECORD. The following quotation is from the issue of March 11, 1916, page 3939:

AN AMERICAN ARMY SCHOOL

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a copy of an article written by Mr. KELLER, State senator of Illinois, which appeared in Harpers Weekly November 20, 1915, in which he discusses and makes certain suggestions about educational advantages which might be extended to private soldiers. This is a very important question and we are now considering it in the Senate. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

During all of the years since the World War our fine, far-seeing Army men have realized the necessity for an Army and reserves. They have been doing their best to keep alive a spirit of a real American Army—the best they were permitted to do by the Congress of the United States. Not only are they to be highly commended for this effort and for all that the Reserve Officers' Training Corps is hoping to do, but the members of the R. O. T. C., every one of them, deserves full credit for the sacrifices that they have made from purely patriotic motives. There ought not be any question nor any possible criticism of this struggle for the development of a competent American Army. Perfectly clearly, the good parts of the R. O. T. C. may be saved in this bill. But we must not overlook the primary objective, and that is to provide soldiers of the highest type for an actual American Army, in which all the men who have devoted so much time and so much care and consideration to the R. O. T. C. will be only too happy to have their opportunity for service extended and to participate in making the best possible Army.

Congress at Present Stands for Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to very many Members of the House of Representatives and I have yet to find one who advocates putting the United States into the present European war. Many of the Members saw service in France 22 years ago. They know the real meaning of war. They came face to face with the dreadful forces of modern warfare. Many of them are battle-scarred. Their minds cannot forget war's fury; their ears still echo with the dying prayers of their brothers in arms; their eyes cannot be dimmed to the sight of falling shrapnel, wounded and dying men. In the hands of these ex-service men lies our greatest guaranty of peace. These veterans would be the first to shoulder arms in defense of our country if our Nation were attacked. But they will have no part in sending the youth of America to fight Europe's battles. Though the minds of Members of Congress were poisoned by the insidious propaganda preceding the World War and this country was led into the last slaughter, I earnestly hope that this Congress will not succumb to strong emotional appeals that pave the way to entrance into foreign wars.

The Great American Desert Has Vanished as a Myth of Our Forefathers—Let Us Not Bring It Back as a Result of Trade Agreements With South America

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, November 1, 1939

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of thousands of miners and mining men in the West, as well as a host of other citizens, I want to express a great fear of a possible fatal injury to the mining industry of this country. Under the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act of June 12, 1934, extended again last Congress to 1940, the State Department is now suggesting a pact with Chile including copper for study. It would be the sheerest folly to include copper in such a trade agreement and thus subject the American copper industry to the destructive competition of South America, Canada, and Africa, but knowing the State Department's theory favoring the trade-agreement program and also our special objective now of cementing friendly commercial relations with Latin America, I know it will take a great deal of light, both political and economic, to induce the Department to leave copper out of such an agreement. I have already taken the matter up with the Department and shall do so further. Permit me in this manner to shed a little further light to the country on this problem.

POLITICAL CONSEQUENCES MAY BE INVOLVED

I like to think of the welfare of my country—my whole country—as the first consideration, and I usually put political considerations, unless they are identical with the consideration of general welfare, in second place. However, in this matter I would not only be derelict to my people but derelict to my political party, if I did not speak out what is in my mind. I believe that there is great likelihood of proposed trade agreement programs alienating some of the States of the West from the Democratic Party. Political leaders today should not count too much upon some big majority piled up lately in some of the Western States for the Democratic Party in recent elections. It may be that personal popularity of candidates accounts for those majorities more than voters' support of party principles. It is a well-known fact that the Democratic State of Arizona has gone Republican in Presidential elections about as often as it has gone Democratic. If thousands of miners, hundreds of cattlemen, other hundreds of wool growers, many farmers, together with thousands of business and professional men who are dependent upon these other producers, feel that they are being hurt by a system of trade agreements, they are very apt to express themselves at the ballot box.

Of course, it might be thought that the farmers, through great reclamation programs, through recent agricultural acts and soil-conservation benefits, and through rural credit arrangements in an effort at parity farm prices, would be so wedded to the administration as to overlook everything else and continue loyal to the administration regardless. Certainly this administration has done much for the farmer and very much for the laborers, and especially for the unemployed. In some of our great mining camps as many as 60 percent of our people have been on relief, many of them have been literally kept from starving by this administration's humane program. All of that is greatly appreciated, but what my self-reliant, self-respecting people of Arizona want is not Government aid in charity, but jobs at good wages in the normal course of things. From a low of 2,000 employed at meager wages in the depth of the depression, Arizona has now reached a comparative high in excess of 15,000 employed at good wages in the copper mining camps. This has come about through an increase in the price of copper of 2 cents per pound. A decrease of 2 cents per pound would reverse that situation and do much more besides, as I shall later explain.

The point I am trying to make is this: That if the miners, the livestock men, and the lumbermen feel their interests hurt, and large numbers of other citizens dependent upon these industries forced out of private employment and back upon W. P. A. rolls, they will undoubtedly express their dissatisfaction through their ballots. The burden of proof in this matter is upon the Department and the administration, first, to see that these citizens are not hurt by the trade program and convince them then to that effect before 1940.

PROPOSAL NOW IN STUDY STAGE

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I know that this proposal, which has sent the shudder of fear over so large a portion of the mining West, is merely a tentative suggestion for study. However, on every hand I hear it said, "What's the use of arguing; the cards are stacked against us. They've got a theory and they're going to put it through, regardless." Now, I do not entertain such lack of confidence, but it is entertained by many recent supporters of the administration out west. It is one thing to list copper for study in an agreement with Chile, since it is one of Chile's most important exports and would need to be studied or at least listed in any pretense of covering the whole field.

Nevertheless, American citizens in the copper-mining camps of the West cannot be blamed for being apprehensive when they know that one of the largest American copper-producing companies has three times the holdings in Chile that it has in the United States. In fact, two American companies own the copper mines of Chile. It is also stated that millions of pounds of foreign copper are in bond in the United States awaiting a reduction of duty to be thrown on our market. To these American citizens in the copper camps of this country it seems apparent that somebody else—that is, two American companies—have a chance to profit by a lowering of duties besides the citizens of Chile.

ARIZONA, THE COPPER STATE

The flag of Arizona has a copper star in the center of it. This signifies that copper is our greatest mineral production. Statistics prove such to be the case. It is beyond my power to portray adequately just what part copper has played in the development of Arizona. What I am about to say concerning copper in Arizona will, of course, apply to copper in several other States, but perhaps to a lesser degree. During the quarter of a century which I have known Arizona, I have seen with my own eyes how much the price of copper spells in the development, the prosperity, the welfare, and the happiness of the people of Arizona.

Even before the World War, copper production was increasing rapidly in Arizona because of the rapid strides in the electrical industry calling for the red metal. Of course, during the World War, the price of copper went up and up and wages increased accordingly, and the merchants, the farmers, and the professional class all experienced a reign of prosperity. Arizona mining companies which 4 years before had paid only a fifth of the total local taxes toward the support of Arizona's government, came to pay more than half of local and State taxes. Million-dollar highways were paved between mining camps and smelter towns, or between farming communities and mining centers. Imposing courthouses were built, fine public-school buildings were erected, and frontier towns were modernized with paved streets, electric lights, and all of the modern conveniences. Many comfortable homes were owned by the professional and working class who formed the very backbone of our citizenry. Let it be kept in mind that virtually all of this material progress, making possible the cultural and spiritual progress as illustrated by our schools and churches, rested upon the production and sale of copper.

Fortunately, the continued growth of the electrical industry, as well as the war demands, kept the price of copper fairly well up for a short while, but the unparalleled war boom had thrown the whole mining economy into confusion, and that, with the coming of the great depression, reduced Arizona and its many erstwhile thriving communities to desperate straits. At one time during the last quarter of a century the assessed valuation of Arizona was above $800,000,000. By 1932 it had dropped below $400,000,000. Although this terrible deflation reached almost everybody, it was the mining industry and communities that suffered most. During the worst of this period I traveled through a dozen great mining camps in Arizona and found huge properties idle, pay rolls all but discontinued, and a few former office executives hanging on as caretakers of the deteriorating mines and smelters.

AGRICULTURE AND MINING MUTUALLY SUPPORTING

Frequently I am reminded by easterners that Arizona has been rather well taken care of by the National Government in matters of reclamation, which is quite true. Out in Arizona the name of Theodore Roosevelt has been attached to the first great dam constructed by the Bureau of Reclamation to bring into being the premier reclamation project of our country. Likewise, the name of Franklin D. Roosevelt is coming to be held in high regard for other great reclamation projects started during this administration through the kindly assistance of the present occupant of the White House. Although Theodore Roosevelt fathered the cause of reclamation, it has remained for another Roosevelt to push this great constructive program very much farther along the way in the past half dozen years. Arizona is grateful and has been greatly helped in this constructive task which would otherwise have been impossible—the task of converting the burning deserts into Gardens of Eden.

There is a close connection, however, between agricultural developments and mining developments in Arizona. One cannot succeed fully without the other. For instance, why was such an expensive highway built from Superior over forbidding mountains to Miami and Globe, mentioning only one of these million-dollar highways? It was not built so much to get mineral products out of those three mining camps, for all had rail outlets at an earlier date, but it was to get farm products from the agricultural valleys into those teeming mining camps. There is an intricate interdependency of all these mining camps and agricultural centers, although they may be from 50 to 100 miles apart. The merchants in our larger towns, especially in such cities as Phoenix and Tucson, have modern stocks and stores and as up-to-date business as can be found in eastern cities, but the volume of their trade depends absolutely upon, and the degree of their prosperity coincides with, the price of copper. Let the mining camps close down and its effects are at once felt by farmers, merchants, and the professional classes, and also reflected in the tax rolls throughout the entire State.

WELFARE OF PEOPLE TO BE CONSIDERED FIRST

I am not here pleading for the mining companies, although I am anxious that they prosper. Certainly I am not now pleading for the sake of those American corporations who have three-fourths of their productive capacity in South America or in foreign holdings. I do think, however, that a great American corporation which is willing to take long risks, as, for instance, the Phelps Dodge, in its operations at Morenci, Ariz., as in several other instances, where many millions of dollars have been spent to move an entire mountain before getting out a pound of copper, ought to be given the most sympathetic consideration by lawmakers. This operation in Greenlee County alone has furnished much employment and created an entirely new community before the darkness of this depression began to break. Such business vision and courage deserves well of this Government. However, it is for the 15,000 miners now employed in Arizona and for all their family dependents and for their economic dependents that I urge the retention of the slight protective duty which has made the recent come-back in copper mining possible.

I have received letters, telegrams, and even long distance telephone calls from Arizona, imploring me to do everything humanly possible to protect our copper industry. From whom have these come? From the Governor, other State executive officers, members of the State legislature, half-dozen different kinds of service clubs, in each of a dozen cities, from almost every one of the chambers of commerce in the State from practically every one of the 50 councils of small-mine operators and from individual, classroom teachers and even ministers of the gospel. Perhaps it is because I have been a school man so long in Arizona that even the classroom school teachers write me about it—for among my school friends, I hear not merely from the president of the university and heads of various colleges. Believe me, clothing, dental work, medical care, professional services—all in Arizona hinge upon the price of copper.

Of course, I know that we must consider the consuming public in all of these trade-agreement matters, and that is exactly what I am thinking about for Arizona, as well as the copper and agricultural producers of the State. When the copper camps are flourishing in Arizona, there is very little agricultural produce or meat shipped outside its borders. For us to have an integrated economic society in that intermountain country means that both mining and agriculture must be encouraged, so that they will be mutually supporting, in order that each may make its distinctive contribution for the rest of the country, the leading mineral production being copper for use outside Arizona and the leading agricultural production being lettuce, melons, garden, and grove products of which Arizona has a surplus. This mutually helpful integration cannot take place unless mining prospers along with agriculture, and both to the same degree. A reduction in the protective duty on copper, forcing a reduction in miners' wages, will be equally hurtful to the agricultural and livestock interests of that part of the West.

CONSERVATION NOT AN ISSUE HERE

It is said by some that we ought to conserve our exhaustible mineral wealth, or any form of natural wealth, which is not easily reproducible. That sounds logical; but let us examine it. In 1934, when Congress laid excise duty on the four products coal, copper, lumber, and oil, no doubt the elements of protection and conservation were considered. I am convinced from a rereading of the debates in Congress, especially in the Senate on June 4, 1934, and again the debates in the Senate on October 31, 1939, by Senators VANDENBERG, HAYDEN, KING, and others who remembered the enactment of the provision 5 years before, that it was not the intent of Congress that the executive department should have any power to modify these revenue duties. The fact that the State Department has recently lowered the duty on lumber and on oil and has gotten away with it thus far is no proof of the constitutionality of their including these in a trade agreement. Perhaps the constitutionality awaits a test in the high Court, and I doubt not but that the coal, lumber, and oil interests will hasten to have such a test. I think that the State Department is on pretty thin ice in any attempt to change these duties fixed by Congress as a part of the revenue system.

And now a word as to conservation. I favor conservation, if it is a sensible type of conservation. I know that we have been wantonly wasteful of natural resources all through American history. We set up the Government of this Republic partly for the benefit of our posterity, but we have not managed our soil fertility, our forests, and many other of our exhaustible blessings for the benefit of our posterity. That which we cannot replace, we certainly ought to be careful about exhausting. Certainly such would apply to coal and oil, and to a certain extent to our forest products, because it took millions of years for Nature to produce certain of these supplies.

But merely because it took a hundred million years to produce a part of the earth is no reason why we ought by law to arrange that that thing shall not be touched for another hundred million years. There is such a thing as carrying conservation to absurd extremes. I recently heard an Army officer declare that we had little or no manganese in the United States and what we have we ought to conserve for the future. On the other hand, I heard an intelligent man say that there is enough manganese in one State alone to match all the iron ore in this country. Now if that be true, what becomes of the argument for conserving our manganese ore?

My contention is that it is irrelevant to talk about the needs of conserving copper. We might just as well talk about the conservation of the gold that is in our hills and plan to leave it there. Copper is practically indestructible. We do not destroy it by taking it out of the ground, unless we make it into munitions or ship it abroad for war. Every pound of copper taken out of the ground adds perpetually to our national wealth. If we want to leave it in the ground to conserve it, it can lie buried for another million years while some substitute such as aluminum may be imported into the country to take its place. That is about what the conservation of our American copper amounts to. I have never heard any sensible man express the fear that we might exhaust our American copper supplies in the same way, for instance, the fear has been expressed that we might exhaust our oil supplies. There is absolutely no cause for our shipping in copper from abroad in the name of conservation.

SHALL WE BLIGHT THE YOUNGEST PART OF OUR LAND?

A reduction of the duty by 2 cents per pound on copper would benefit no one in Chile, excepting, possibly, two American copper companies. It would merely mean that more foreign copper would enter from Canada than from South America, and it is very likely that there would be little or no increased export trade with Chile because of it. A possible effect for American citizens at home might be cheaper raw copper for the fabricators. It is extremely doubtful whether there would be any lowering of prices of finished products made from this copper. Fewer American laborers in manufacturing plants would be benefited than the number of laborers who would be thrown out of employment or reduced in wage scales throughout the copper-mining States.

Reduce the price of copper 2 cents per pound and no more bronze doors will be ordered for courthouses, university libraries, capitol buildings, or city halls in my State. Instead, the bronze doors that are there would probably be removed for wooden substitutes. Fifty years ago our grandfathers looked upon all the country west of Kansas City as the Great American Desert, and so marked it on the maps. Since then the enterprising pioneers have carved a dozen great States therein containing a virile population and a fourth of the wealth of this Nation, thus belying the old geography label. However, I honestly believe that a program of reciprocal-trade agreements among ourselves and South American countries could be negotiated with a view of pleasing the latter, which would have the effect of bringing back the Great American Desert and thus verifying the old label. I have too much confidence in American statesmanship to think that such is likely to happen.

The Speaker is a Representative, Too

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS H. CASE

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I am a Republican. I am a northerner—the only southern thing about me is that I come from South Dakota. I am under no obligation to speak a word for any southern Democrat. I have had occasion recently, however, to observe such an outstanding example of service to his constituents by a southern Democratic Representative that I am moved to mention it for the RECORD.

That service was your own, Mr. Speaker, in taking the leadership in the movement to secure needed aid for distressed people in the drought and flood areas. The comprehensive program announced within the past few days is the evidence of its effectiveness.

In announcing "the plan for handling the situation in rural areas, which has been developed jointly by four Federal agencies," Dr. Will W. Alexander, Administrator of the Farm Security Administration, has said:

> As you know, this plan was worked out at the request of the President as a consequence of discussion and conference with him by interested Senators and Representatives.

And, as one of the Representatives who met with the President and the Federal agencies, I want to add that the conferences and the results are directly attributable to the leadership and interest taken by you in your capacity as Representative of an Alabama district.

It was the Representative from Alabama who called the meeting of Representatives from States that had suffered droughts and floods. It was the Representative from Alabama who was asked by them to name a committee. It was the Representative from Alabama who "dropped in" at the office of his brother, the distinguished Senator from Alabama, and gave an encouraging word as the committee of Representatives met with a like committee of Senators. It was the Representative from Alabama who greeted us at the White House and gave us a helpful introduction as he left us to discuss the problem with the President.

The average Member of Congress, Mr. Speaker, sees you only as Speaker of the House. We know you honor that position by your fairness and your faithfulness and your ability. We seldom think of the fact that you, too, have a district to represent—a district with problems and needs such as the others have. But I wish to say, with this opportunity for personal knowledge and observation, that it is evident that, with all your other duties and responsibilities, you have never overlooked that fact and that you give to its representation the same diligent and effective service that has made you such an outstanding Speaker of the House of Representatives.

National Defense Preparation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. BUELL SNYDER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to be one of the guest speakers on October 27 last, before the National Guard Convention, which was being held in the city of Baltimore. My remarks on that occasion follow:

General Dozier, General Marshall, General Drum, friends of the National Guard:

We are gathered here today at a most crucial time. Long-disturbed conditions beyond our shores have taken a turn which is a matter of very grave concern to every citizen of our country.

War, with all its hellishness and aftermath, has again befallen much of Europe. It is a matter of very grave concern to America and to every other neutral nation in the world.

Why this new outbreak or what brought it about is not of paramount importance at this time. While we may have our own convictions or opinions, we may leave that job to the historians. What concerns us chiefly now is that, with the lessons of the war to end wars fresh in the minds of all who have a responsibility in the leadership of nations, there still survives in places the doctrine of force, of bloodshed, of wanton destruction of life and property, for settling international issues or gratifying national ambitions.

Long since it became apparent that the world was not ready for a Kellogg Pact. I cannot bring myself to believe, however, that the principles of that noble instrument are dead. I, for one, believe that the peoples of all nations, independently of their leadership, overwhelmingly are in favor of the renunciation of the use of war as an instrument of national policy, and I, for one, shall continue devoutly to hope that the will of this great majority will in the end prevail, but the saddening truth is that today national tranquillity must still look to a ready and adequate defense establishment "as the most effectual means of preserving peace."

Neither as to extent nor direction can it be prophesied as to how this new outburst will affect the United States, its security, and its policies. Despite our will for peace, however averse we may be to taking up arms, prudence leaves no course but to be prepared for any eventuality.

In my position as chairman of the subcommittee which handles military appropriations for the House of Representatives I propose to continue, more vigorously than ever, to use my office to build up our military and naval arms to a state of perfection and readiness which no nation would dare challenge.

If such a course be the path to national security, to the preservation of our institutions, to saving from soldiers' graves the flower of our youth then I say all of us, here and now, should pledge ourselves to employ all ways open to us speedily to accomplish a proper measure of preparedness.

It is a source of much gratification to me, as I know it is to you, that we do not have to start from scratch. Very substantial progress has been made within the past few years. I became a member of the subcommittee of which I am now the chairman at the beginning of the Seventy-fourth Congress back in 1935. Therefore, I have had either a direct hand in, or the direction of, the preparation of five annual appropriation measures. My first bill, for the fiscal year 1936, appropriated a total of $341,000,000. For the present fiscal year, including supplemental appropriations, the total exceeds $732,000,000—well, more than double.

The year before my connection with the committee the National Guard appropriations amounted to $27,950,000. For the current year the National Guard total is $53,200,000, an increase of about 90 percent, and that excludes, of course, the extent to which the National Guard will share in the munitions of war appropriated for in the Supplemental Military Appropriation Act passed at the last session.

It will be of interest to you to know, I am sure, that during the 5-year period I have mentioned my committee has added to Budget estimates for the National Guard a total of, roundly, $8,000,000. To the extent that you have been helped by that unbudgeted amount you should be grateful to the splendid officers you have been sending to Washington each year to make known to us your needs, and, possibly I should say, to the one whom you seem to have delegated as your chief negotiator. I refer to Gen. Milton Reckord.

He has long held the respect, the esteem, and admiration of my committee.

I am glad to have an opportunity to pay him that compliment right here in his own home town.

I shall continue, with your permission, with a few more comparisons—not of money, but of men and materials.

During my period of responsibility:

The enlisted strength of the Regular Army has jumped from 118,750 to 203,616.

The officer strength has increased from 12,000 to 13,417.

The strength of the National Guard has been stepped up from 190,000 to 210,000.

Of course, I am referring to increases which our appropriation measures have provided for. I am not including the increases being made in consequence of Presidential action induced by the existing emergency.

Now, continuing, in addition to manpower, the national matches have been restored.

A consolidated appropriation for field exercises, initiated the year before my taking hold, has been increased from $156,000 to $382,000 for the Regular Army, and provision has been made for the National Guard's participation in such exercises and separate appropriations made therefor.

When I took hold our airplane objective was 2,320. We had less than 1,500 planes of all kinds. The present objective is 5,500 planes, and appropriations or contractual authority have been made available to provide us with that number.

Substantially larger appropriations have been provided for motorization, for mechanization, and for guns and ammunition. I do not feel at liberty to disclose the details, but I think if I should contrast just two or three appropriations for you, you will be able to form some opinion of the expansion that has occurred and is occurring.

For ordnance service and supplies the appropriation for 1936 was $15,000,000. For the current year the total is $115,000,000, exclusive of contractual authority of $56,000,000.

For the Signal Corps the 1936 figure was $4,830,000, and for the current year the total is $16,475,000, exclusive of contractual authority of $1,160,000.

As to this arm it is only fair to say that Air Corps equipment is responsible for a sizeable part of the increase.

For seacoast defenses, maintenance and improvement, the 1936 total was $1,284,970. For this year there has been made available $12,993,000 and contractual authority of $1,061,000.

I have not burdened you with amounts for the intermediate years. There has occurred a gradual climb right up to the present year, when the jump became very marked.

Obviously, the aggregate only can mean very substantial progress toward an M day state of readiness. I wish I might disclose to you how ready.

To me two of the biggest accomplishments with which I have been associated are the promotion of field exercises and maneuvers and the protective mobilization plan.

I stand ready to support whatever amount we may be asked to provide for field exercises. Irrespective of the present emergency, I think it is vital that we should capitalize to the utmost upon the experience of those of you whose knowledge of the conduct of modern warfare was gained from actual participation in the World War.

The protective mobilization plan made available to the Congress for the first time a more or less stable goal at which to shoot and check by and program a course of accomplishment. With its adoption our needs became quite definitely fixed and deficiencies became readily ascertainable.

As I have told you, the deficiencies are being rapidly wiped out. I have in mind antiaircraft equipment, small arms, field-artillery matériel, combat vehicles, special vehicles, railway artillery, modernization of equipment, ammunition, engineer equipment, signal equipment, chemical equipment, etc.—in fact, practically everything in the matériel category.

It would surprise you to see the great number of items that have been completely provided for, and I want you to know that they are not alone for the Regular Army but for issue to those units of the National Guard which have accommodations for their custody and maintenance. My committee took particular pains to assure itself on that score.

We have not been marking time, my friends. We have made very great strides, and I want to say to you that we shall not stop until in men and matériel and training those of you upon whom we must depend for guidance shall indicate that we have gone as far as prudence demands.

Of very great concern to every nation when war clouds hover is leadership. We need not look beyond this hall to be at ease on that score. The Nation is fortunate, indeed, in having available and ready such peerless soldiers, tried and proven on many battlefields, as Gen. George Marshall and Gen. Hugh Drum.

As I look about this hall, I see many others whose World War records stand as monuments to the traditional qualities of leadership, courage, and valor displayed by American soldiers since the dawn of the Republic.

I pray God, however, that none of you may be called upon again to take up arms in the Nation's defense.

In conclusion, my friends, it impresses me as particularly fitting that you should have chosen to hold your convention this year in this beautiful and hospitable city of Baltimore. It was here, but a few short weeks ago, that a celebration was held of the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the writing of the words of our national anthem. Something akin to the inspiration which guided the penning of those immortal lines wells up in all of us in this hour of threatened peace. Whatever the turn of events, my faith is unshakable that our Star-Spangled Banner will continue in triumph to wave "o'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

The Farm Security Administration and the Migrant Labor Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, the problem of America's homeless families arises out of three sources: First, the American spirit of "moving on" whenever conditions become too difficult in the home country; second, the industrialization of agriculture in large areas of the South and Southwest; and, third, generally depressed conditions in agriculture and industry with consequent unemployment and distress.

The only real solution of this problem lies in improved economic conditions for the whole Nation including full use of productive capacity, vastly improved distribution of income, and a consequent balance between production and consumption of goods at an abundance level. To say this is impossible is not only to say that American democracy is licked, but also to say that we must expect to have a permanent class of homeless families in our Nation. Nobody, I believe, is willing to say either of these things. For that reason we cannot for one single instant, be content with the economic and social progress so far made under the New Deal. We must press relentlessly forward with a program that will banish unemployment, unnecessary poverty, and homelessness from our great Nation.

As the St. Louis Post-Dispatch puts it editorially in commenting on this problem of family transiency:

> This is more than a matter of humanitarianism. Considering the political dynamite in the situation unless we find jobs for the jobless our traditional idea of the American way of life will be only a souvenir of a happier day.

We cannot, however, expect to work out the complete solution to the unemployment problem in a short space of time. Meanwhile this problem of our homeless families demands immediate attention. The Farm Security Administration, which knows more about the real situation than any agency in America, estimates there are 350,000 families in the Nation today wandering from place to place and job to job, without a home. This is no mere proposition of a couple of hundred thousand unattached men drifting about the country on freight trains. It is a problem of uprooted, bewildered families. Along the roads and in the camps babies are being born—and dying. Young people are marrying—or having children without marrying. People are suffering from disease, exposure, malnutrition. They are religious people of old American stock. But their present plight makes them wonder about America and maybe about God.

To bring the story right down to the present let us see what Governor Olson's cotton wage board recently had to say—not about wages, but about living conditions among the migrants in the San Joaquin Valley.

The general report stated:

> Although there are acceptable camps, too many workers continue to occupy shacks and tents devoid of comfort, in overcrowded camps badly lacking in adequate sanitary accommodations, lacking in decent drinking water, and, for the most part, unprotected from flies and mosquitoes.
> Such a situation tends to create a permanency of rural slums. The expansion of the Farm Security Administration camp system or of some similar program would therefore seem to be the direction in which camp conditions can be best improved. Most of the witnesses who testified agreed that the migratory labor camps maintained by the Farm Security Administration are superior to the average private camp.

And then the committee, still unanimously, summed up something of what both Steinbeck and McWilliams were trying to say in their books:

> Where conditions of squalor, extreme privation, absence of privacy and lack of security are encountered little real home life is possible for the children of agricultural workers in this area.
> Because of their unsettled mode of living, they must move from school to school. Their education is frequently interrupted and cut short. Although the more fortunate go to high school, they go handicapped by the environment in which they are forced to live.
> Under such circumstances, the hindrances to mental and moral growth are considerable. The threatening long-time social results of a continuance of these conditions are obvious and alarming.

The magnitude of this problem can be guessed at when a few figures are given. Over the past 10 years an average of 100,000 people in families described as "in immediate need of employment" have migrated to California alone. Many of them have been needed as agricultural workers at certain times of the year. But total available jobs in California agriculture vary from about 50,000 in January to nearly 500,000 at the peak of the fall harvest. The same story could be told of many other States.

Quite naturally, under these circumstances, wage scales become low. They are a little better in California than elsewhere, but at that the average annual income of a migrant family will not be over $300 or $400. Nor is this always the fault of their employers. As Governor Olson recently put it:

> I believe the growers find themselves in a difficult spot on wage scales. They are under contract to gin owners and are unable to pay higher picking prices. They are willing to pay higher wage scales, but are unable to come out and do so themselves.
> A strike under these conditions is really a strike through the growers at the financial interests controlling cotton.

The Governor's words are true, but the possibility of conflict between hard-pressed farmer employers and still harder pressed ex-farmer laborers remains a constant threat.

Throughout all history it has been a convenient device of secure and comfortable groups of people to excuse their failure to find a decent solution for the problems of outcast people by calling them by ugly names and attempting to stamp upon them the label of foreigner. The homeless people of America today have been widely treated in exactly this way. A demand for better wages or more decent conditions on their part has been the signal to start calling them "reds." Each State into which they have migrated has been glad to have them only so long as there was seasonal work to be done. Thereafter, they were told they should "go back where they came from." Driven out by the action of one group of landlords, these native American Christian people have all too often been received with ill-concealed hostility by the landlords and communities of the States where they have gone.

This is not American. And it cannot be allowed to go on.

What is to be done about it? Most immediately effective is the work of the Farm Security Administration in rehabilitating farm families on their own places in their own States. This is stopping migration at its source. Working almost alone in this field in the whole Nation, and working on a tragically inadequate budget, Farm Security has, in my judgment, done a magnificent job. A half million families have received rehabilitation loans and with the loans advice and guidance, and out of the two a better standard of living, a larger net worth, and a return of hope. These loans made to people utterly without security are, I understand, 80 percent current in repayments today. The first thing I would recommend, therefore, is more money for Farm Security rehabilitation work. But unless our general agricultural problem is solved, the dike cannot, of course, be held forever.

The second thing that must be done to the greatest possible extent is the opening up of new lands and new farming opportunities for these people. Most of them are former farmers, and most of them want to get back to the land again. Moreover, there are some areas of the Nation from which we are told a considerable emigration must take place if we are not to turn more and more of our Nation into "dust bowls." One of the reasons I so deeply regreted the defeat of the so-called lending bill by the House at the last session was the fact that it would have made available for the first time a really large sum of money with which to make loans to get homeless farmers back to farming again. These loans should be made at a nominal interest rate and should be used, in part at least, to reduce that great group of 350,000 homeless families and to make some of them homeless no more. The importance of reclamation projects and of a national program of land-use planning in this connection is obvious.

But clearly this ideal solution will take time and money. Meanwhile, there is a great human need to be met—these people are sick, ill-housed, underfed, and we have not yet anywhere near an adequate program to meet their need. Nor, in my opinion, can there possibly be such a program until the Federal Government fully recognizes this problem of interstate migration as essentially a national and not a local problem. The States which are on the receiving end of this great interstate migration simply cannot, as their spokesmen put it, take care of their own unemployed and those of other States as well.

Their schools are overburdened and overcrowded, their hospitals in many cases overrun, and their relief agencies swamped with appeals they cannot meet. Inevitably, under these circumstances, the blame for the situation is wrongly placed. It is placed on the migrants who in most cases, I am convinced, do not deserve the blame at all. Some blame should attach, no doubt, to a few selfish people who deliberately seek to keep an oversupply of labor available near the fields. But mainly the blame rests upon the great national conditions I have described.

Housing, health, and food are the minimum requirements right now in connection with these problems. One answer to the housing problem is provided by the Federal camps of the Farm Security Administration. A brief description of these camps and the results of their work may be interesting.

They are simple affairs, consisting of series of camp sites, 30 feet square, arranged around central and stationary wash trays, with hot- and cold-water faucets. Several of these groupings are constructed to each camp. Board floors are provided on which tents can be pitched. Fast-growing shade trees are planted throughout the camps, and pending the time when the trees will be large enough to furnish shade, ramadas are provided as protection from the direct rays of the sun. A central community house serves as a meeting place where gatherings of all kinds are held. A baseball diamond and horseshoe courts provide recreational outlets for the men. Playgrounds are provided for the children. Sewing machines in the community house enable the women to mend their clothes. All is managed in a democratic fashion by camp committees, which take the responsibility of keeping the camps in running order. No feature of the camp program has proved to be more startling than has the working of these committees. If a family is destitute or in want, the camp welfare committee sees that the essential needs are provided.

There is a Government supervisor in charge of each of these camps and a nurse is on duty as well, supplied by the Public Health Service. People have opportunity to keep clean. They have a place where they have an unquestioned right to camp and live and are no longer forced to camp on someone else's property, along a roadside, or on the banks of a canal. Health can be supervised and cared for. Self-respect has returned. Ten cents a day rent is paid for the accommodations and camp committees take a major share of the responsibility for the upkeep of the place.

Improvement of the living standards of agricultural workers, such as takes place among those living in the Resettlement camps, has several very constructive consequences. First, it removes the worst menaces to health and morals; second, it improves the spirit and morale of the people; third, this not only places them in a position to ask for better wages but enables the ranchers and farmers to be able to afford to pay them better wages; fourth, certain of the farmers are said to be developing a tendency to mingle socially with the workers in the camps, which makes, of course, for far better feeling and greater understanding between the two groups; finally, under circumstances like these, a more capable class of workers is attracted to these farm-labor jobs, which in turn sets in motion another upward spiral of conditions like the one already described.

The only fault I have to find with these camps is that there are not enough of them. I wish we might have enough such camps so that, taken together with such really adequate housing facilities as some farm operators have provided, every migrating family could live under conditions of decency. Had we such a system of camps throughout the Nation, the problem of bringing workers and jobs together would be greatly simplified.

Another approach to the problem, and one offering perhaps even more hope for a permanent solution, is the settling of some of the migrant families on small tracts of land in regions where there is considerable seasonal wage labor required. Thus they can become residents of a community again, supplementing their small acreage which they can be enabled to purchase over a period of time.

There remain the immediate problems of health and the provision of necessary relief. It is in connection with these matters that I have introduced and reintroduced legislation on which I hope to gain hearing when Congress reconvenes in January.

The approach of this legislation is simple. It provides for Federal grants-in-aid to States to reimburse the States for moneys expended by them or their local agencies in the relief of out-of-State people. Administration is to be handled locally but subject to plans approved by either the Public Health Service or the Social Security Board. In other words, the Federal Government would be saying to the States: "We recognize that this is a national problem and we propose to help you meet it. If you will be responsible for seeing to it that the health and relief needs of these people from other States are met, then Uncle Sam will help you pay the bill."

I would be the last to suggest that the passage of such legislation offers any real answer to this great national problem. All it would do would be to meet an immediately present need. For a final solution we must, as I said in the beginning, work upon such measures as will restore our whole agricultural population to its rightful economic position and bring about a condition where constant, steady demand on the part of consumers will bring about a full use of our productive capacity and a full employment of all our people.

LETTER FROM HON. RUSH D. HOLT, OF WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter written by me on the topic "Saving Democracy."

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A LETTER TO WEST VIRGINIANS ON SAVING DEMOCRACY

DEAR FRIENDS: It is quite common to hear the expression "Save democracy." Most of the talk about saving democracy, however, is for us to save it across the ocean. I am interested in saving it here.

We have the greatest democracy on earth. Our involvement in war will be its greatest danger. The first casualty of war will be our freedom. To hear many Government spokesmen, one would think their duties call for them to look after the entire world. They talk about the poor citizens of this country and that country. If they would devote half as much attention to the poor citizens of our own country they would be rendering more service.

War will not solve our domestic problems. It will aggravate them. Prosperity will not result from the conflict. War does not and will not bring prosperity. It will bring depression. It will be a "penny wise and pound foolish" course.

I wrote an article for Investor America, in which I state, in part:

"Save democracy! Yes; now is the time to save it. Not 'over there,' but right here in a nation where democracy has worked and will work if given an opportunity to do so. We hear about the terrible atrocities in Europe. No one doubts that they are terrible, but we have atrocities in hunger and desolation right here in our own country. While some persons are worrying about the furnishing of materials to the warring nations others of us are worried about the furnishing of food and clothing to the American people. While some folk are regretting the terrible desolation in European cities where factories are closed because of the hostilities of war, we must also realize that we have a problem here where factories are closed because of the hostilities of political fakers.

"Have we forgotten our Federal debt? It will have passed $41,000,000,000 before this article is in print. That debt is continuing to climb, but if we get into war it won't climb; it will jump—jump to heights that will threaten, if not destroy, the financial stability of our own country. We cannot continue to allow this mounting debt to go on unless we are willing to face inflation or repudiation, either of which will be destructive to all investments in this country; yes—investments in stocks and bonds; yes—investments in factories; but, all important, investments in the homes and farms of this country.

"We worry about the danger of an invading army when our real danger is the army of officeholders here. By the time the armistice was signed in 1918 the Government had recruited thousands and thousands of persons in the progress of the war. But today there are more persons on our Federal pay roll than there were then, and, under the name of national emergency, we are going to see this list continue to grow.

"While the national emergency continues to grow in intensity, according to the administration's spokesmen, it is interesting to note that the 1940 election looms closer and closer.

"Also, under the name of national emergency, we can expect to see many spending projects brought back into Congress.

" 'Watch out or some big, bad man from across the sea will get you,' we are warned. And while we look at Europe we forget that the depression is still with us. Those who would divert our attention from domestic affairs say, 'Think of the million men on the western front,' when they know our greatest problem is the ten to twelve million unemployed here on our home front. These unemployed want jobs in private factories, mines, and mills; not public jobs in the trenches of France.

"I am glad that businessmen have found out what 1 month's war has done to the taxes of England. That is important. But let us not forget our tax crisis here. England's overhauling of its taxes is significant. We have been promised an overhauling of our own domestic tax problem; but now under an excuse of an emergency it is completely in the background.

"Yes; I see bad signs for democracy. But the difference between my sight and that of the administration is that the administration is looking across the ocean while I am looking at the situation here in America. Our challenge is here—with the depression, with our tax policies, with our failure to solve the unemployment problem. Let's begin by saving democracy in America. Let's keep the greatest country in the world as a democracy, not place it under dictatorship in an M-day under the false guise of 'saving democracy' somewhere else."

European nations did not solve their economic problems. We must not fail in our solution. America wants peace and prosperity. This can best be accomplished by "saving democracy" here in our own country.

Sincerely,

RUSH D. HOLT.

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ADDRESS BY MERLE SIDENER

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, although happiness is intangible and elusive to those who have not discovered the approach to it, there is a sure way to find it through service to others, and the road that leads to true happiness is the road to salvation.

Because I believe that an excellent talk on this subject, which was delivered by Merle Sidener to Christian Men Builders on October 15, 1939, has in it the seeds of potential helpfulness to thousands upon thousands of people if they will read and ponder over it, I present it for publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as follows:

QUALITY HAPPINESS

After I selected this subject, Quality Happiness, and began to study it I discovered that I had the wrong subject; there isn't any such thing as quality happiness. There are no degrees of happiness. You are either happy or not happy; you can't be half happy. I think that we either find happiness, genuine enthusiastic happiness, or we don't find it. I am not going to try to set up various phases of happiness or pick out a quality happiness. What I am going to talk about is just happiness, and I hope you and I will get something out of this discussion that will let us more nearly enjoy happiness.

There are a variety of definitions of happiness. Maybe that's why so many of us fail to recognize happiness when we meet it. There are too many different angles to it—too many different approaches to happiness. Mr. Webster, known for the one book he wrote, said that "happiness is a state of pleasurable content in one's condition of life."

Socrates, the old Greek philosopher, said, "Happiness is unrepentant pleasure."

Rousseau, the French social philosopher, had this definition, "Happiness consists of a good bank account, a good cook, and good digestion." He probably came nearer to defining it as you and I would. We look for something in the physical as happiness.

Arthur Brisbane, editorial writer for many years says this: "There are two kinds of happiness; the lesser consists of finding the work for which you are fitted and then doing it, and the greater, reserved for a few, is working for others."

Jesus Christ, the greatest teacher of all time, the only really successful man who ever lived, the only one you and I can listen to and accept without qualification—Jesus as he went about teaching and doing good, telling men how to get the most out of life, laying stress on the fact that the great motivation of life is love, friendship, doing to others as we would like to have them do to us. That was the theme of the teaching of Jesus, and Jesus says, "If ye know these things, happy are ye, if ye do them." Another point Jesus brought out—"These things have I spoken unto you that my joy might remain in you and that you might be filled with joy."

I have given those definitions to help us all here this morning, to get a better understanding of what happiness really is and therefore have a reason for trying to get happiness. We will never get it if we don't understand it; if we have a wrong perspective we don't enjoy happiness.

Henry Drummond sums it up like this: "Half of the world is on the wrong scent in the pursuit of happiness. They think happiness consists of having and getting, and in being served by others. It really consists solely of giving and serving others." Let's get that—because there is the contrast—the place where you and I will get on the wrong side of this thing. Half the world is on the wrong scent—thinks in terms of happiness as getting possessions—of getting from other people—of having people do things for you. Now Mr. Drummond, the wise man, says, "Not at all, it consists entirely in giving and in serving others."

Therefore, fellows, if we'll stop to think about it, that's about all there is in life. What does everybody want? They want happiness, sure. Some people want money, some want health; they ask for different things; but what they mean is they want happiness. If you and I will get into our minds that happiness is not a selfish possession, that happiness hasn't any relation to selfishness, that if we center on ourselves we never will be happy. But only as we open ourselves up to others, only as we find the means of making others happy are we going to get true happiness. Selfish possession just does not give happiness. This is very elementary, rather silly, to say to a group of intelligent men, as it seems so obvious, but you can't have happiness at the expense of other people. You just can't ignore their interests merely to satisfy yourself at the particular minute when you want to be satisfied.

There is a popular song that I have always liked—Frank Crummit sings its—"I want to be happy, but I can't be happy until I make you happy, too." It's a pretty good song—it's good philosophy. I'll be happy if you are happy, then we'll both be happy. There is an expression of real happiness we can all enjoy.

Happiness is something you give away. The more you give away, the more you get back. That's somewhat of a paradox—the more you give away, the more you get back. It's about the only thing I know of, of which that is absolutely true; the more you distribute, the more come back to you. It is like casting bread on the water. A lot of people say it gets soggy and sinks, but that is because they are too literal and do not understand the spiritual side. It is true that you cast your bread on the waters in kindness, in thoughtfulness, in courtesy; and it comes back—you get benefit from it in some fashion.

I read this week a book by Channing Pollock, called The Adventures of a Happy Man. In the preface he says that he never had an unhappy hour in his life—I looked out of the corner of my eye at that one. But in this book he pretty nearly proves it, because he, early in life, found the right perspective on happiness.

His formula is to be happy with what you have—not always to be reaching, and hoping, and expecting something else. You know, fellows, if you just stop to think about it, there is a lot of common sense in that—be happy with what you have. I'll make a confession—I've missed a lot of happiness in my life because, instead of enjoying what I've had to be happy with, I have been hoping, and reaching, and expecting something else, and not recognizing the blessings which I have enjoyed, but seeing somebody else with something more, and then thinking when I get to that point—then I will be happy, too. You have probably done that all your life too, reaching, always looking beyond, thinking of the green pasture across the road. If you and I, today, were just to sit down and count our blessings, just sit down and actually become conscious of the good we are enjoying, ignoring that which we have not, but appreciating that which we have—we would be happy.

I am reminded of the story of the man who had the worn-out shoes and felt so sorry for himself about not having any shoes, until he saw a man with no feet, and then he forgot to be sorry for himself and was thankful for the fact he had feet. You and I should do that—look around us constantly and find those who are worse off than we. If we would stop, men, to think of what we have, we would be happy. This, then, is the key of what I want to say, "Happiness is for today—not tomorrow." Happiness is enjoying that which we have, making the best of what we've got, using the abilities we have.

I went out to call on Thelma Johnson, a friend of Christian Men Builders, who has been ill. She has been very sick. Lately she has been suffering a great deal. Her mother took me up to her room; there she was with a great big smile on her face. I think Thelma Johnson is listening this morning, and I want to tell her and you that I didn't go out to see her last Sunday morning just to be cheered up; but things hadn't been going right; I wasn't accomplishing some things that I wanted to accomplish; I was feeling sorry for myself; but when that great big smile of yours shone out from your face I had a feeling of happiness. Just to think that you, in spite of everything, making the best of everything, could be happy and smiling made my troubles seem very small.

There are a lot of folks doing the same thing. If you and I could see them enjoying the portion of health they have in spite of their ills, could just look into those rooms, see these friends of ours who are now listening, see them smile, I'm telling you, fellows, it would give us a jolt. It would make us stop and wonder why we are going around with long faces. Well, all right. I just want to get that into your mind and mine. I hope you do go out of here this morning knowing what you have to be happy about and then start being happy because you have the ability to make other people happy. A man stood back here this morning and told me with tears in his eyes about Marshall Harvey's driving 60 miles out of his way across country because of the death of this man's mother. Harvey didn't think he was doing anything special. He had the ability to go, he used this ability, and he gave happiness. He couldn't help but get happiness from it.

Do you think the officers and members of the C. M. B. Century Club are getting happiness from their work? Just start talking to any one of them—see their faces light up when they tell you how they have placed glasses on the faces of needy children with impaired vision. Somebody came in and handed Jesse McClure a couple of pairs of glasses. There is an example of true, genuine happiness coming as a reaction from serving others. The members of this organization can tell about approximately 1,400 pairs of glasses being donated—the figure gets so big we can hardly appreciate it. Let's just take one single case—that of a little girl who had been excluded from school because she couldn't see the blackboard and they thought she was dumb. The little girl didn't know she couldn't see the blackboard and there was no way for the teacher to know what the trouble was. * * * "Sarah, what is the answer to that problem?" the teacher would say. Sarah would look blank and say, "I don't know." Finally the little thing was asked not to come to school, for she was in the way. Then along came our Century Club. They worked with the school nurses to find the children that needed glasses. One of the nurses remembered Sarah and wondered if that might be a case of impaired vision. The child was taken to the clinic and they found the worst case of astigmatism on the records. Following treatment, the Century furnished the glasses. Within 3 months she was the brightest child in her class. * * * Happiness—how could anyone get more happiness than the person who provided that $3 for a pair of glasses, or the nurse that aided the child, or the Century Club—all giving happiness, and therefore finding happiness. This illustration will show you what I mean by the fact that you get it only if you give it.

You can't catch up with happiness, you can't grab happiness, you can't buy happiness—you have got to entice happiness so that happiness will come to you voluntarily. You can't buy it, you can't steal it, you just have to win it, and you win it by your attitude, by your appreciation of your relationship to other human beings; you win it by a consciousness that you can't live by yourself. It is only as you come into contact with others that finally you get benefit from it; as some of these other people have to whom I have referred this morning.

Abraham Lincoln said, "Most folks are about as happy as they make up their minds to be." That's another one of those typical Lincoln sayings that you have to stop and read a second time to get the real significance of it.

Envy and covetousness—desiring what somebody else has—envious because somebody else has something that you haven't; that brings nothing but unhappiness. * * * Prejudice and hatred result solely in unhappiness. When you hate, there is something that drives away the possibility of happiness. The whole situation in Europe today is one of hatred, with a complete disappearance of happiness. I don't suppose there is a happy soul in all of Europe today. But if there had been love, tolerance, friendliness, the whole of Europe could be happy. These things I speak of never produce anything but unhappiness. Conflict and contention and resistance—this thing we have today which we call class consciousness, where there seems to be an effort to set one group of us against the other; trying to make us feel, "Well, I'm going to get ahead of him; I'm going to take advantage of him; I'm going to get the best of him"—it can't produce anything but unhappiness. Let these same groups get together and say, "How can we come to an understanding of each other?" and thereby coming to the point of mutual understanding, and they have mutual happiness.

The unhappiest people are the people who possess the most. The most unhappy people are those who get to the place where they don't want anything—they've got everything. Just stop to think about that a moment. Once you get to the place where there isn't anything to reach for, then you are dissatisfied—you have everything. There is nothing else for you to reach for—to get. You can't be happy in that state of mind. But so long as we need to struggle a little, to work a little, to strive a little to get the things we want—then we have happiness while we are getting them.

Happiness is not found in the pursuit of what we call pleasure, either. Stop and think about that a moment. The pursuit of what you and I call amusement, pleasure, self-indulgence, does not result in happiness, because they are selfish things. * * * That spirit of, "I want what I want, when I want it," regardless of everybody else, so that I can be happy, won't work. If I pursue an idea that is intended just to give me personal pleasure it will not be pleasure but turns to ashes in the mouth. Whoopee parties for happiness! Huh! * * * Look at them next morning! Now I'm certainly in favor of recreation and enjoyment, but these must be of such a nature that other people enjoy them also—and no one gets hurt as a result of what I enjoy.

Well, that's the whole thing; that's the story. Happiness and righteousness are absolutely inseparable. Put that down in your little book. Happiness and righteousness. * * * What is righteousness? * * * Just what I have said so many times—right living. Finding God's way—loving the other fellow as ourselves—treating the other fellow as we want to be treated, therefore being fair. That is right living. This alone results in happiness and nothing else will produce it—for that is God's plan.

The Folklore of Fatalism

OF

HON. T. V. SMITH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks upon the subject The Folklore of Fatalism, I submit the following observations upon the superiority of the American way of life to all present competitors:

Let us consider this peculiar feeling, the fear of some that our peaceful nation may get into war against its will. That is fatalism, at least middle-size fatalism. For fatalism is the darksome faith that what will come, will come—no matter what we want or will. As an American fatalist once put it to me, "The fated will happen whether it ever comes to pass or not!" Now, fatalism has its own folklore—a lore that flourishes to its full wherever fatalism grows full-size today.

I. COMMUNISM, A FULL-FLEDGED FATALISM

Take communism, for instance. It is a full-sized fatalism. It was brooded long ago of German speculation. Turned upside down, that speculation became the revolution in Russia. And now the horrid hybrid is come home to Germany for an ugly roost. Communism is fatalism with a folklore Germanic, then, as well as Russian. To understand this is to begin to avoid both its idealistic and its materialistic folly.

From the gospel, according to their St. Marx—Karl Marx, a German while living, a Russian when dead—we are supposed to learn the inevitability of human brotherhood without caste or class. This side of Utopia, however, the rich and the poor are always fighting. The poor, so Marx teaches, have been made poor by the rich, and so the rich must be made poor by the poor; a nose for a thumb and a thumb for a nose, you see—just like the communistic comrades we see in the world today. This process is the "class struggle," death dealing among neighbors and even between friends, with everybody informing the secret police on everybody else. Such is war at its very worst, this death dealing among neighbors and friends. Yet it is a war so sacred, the "class war" is, that the faithful must create it, if they do not find it thriving, for the folklore of Marxist fatalism claims it to be inevitable—a war utterly necessary to the outworking of what they call "dialectical materialism."

This high-sounding phrase, "dialectical materialism," is meant by Marxists to name the cosmic power that guarantees the bright blessedness resulting from dark fate. It differs from plain barnyard materialism in being more deadly. Believe it or not, this new-fangled materialism guarantees classless peace from the class war, comradeship from suspicion and hate, human welfare from universal ill-fare. It will take more than trumped-up fate to bring this paradox to pass on earth, for among men like still produces like—not good bad, nor bad good. The actual results of this dark faith we see already. Comrades exile or murder comrades in a frenzy of friendliness. Trotsky, big comrade to the big comrade, rusts now in exile—or, as a wag has said, "sulks in his tenets." And ten thousands more—from generals to the generality of peasants—rest in violent graves as tribute ironic to their faith in cosmic fatalism. Now, no doubt—

> The grave's a fine and private place,
> But there I think none do embrace.

The embrace of comradeship is murdered by the comrades.

II. NAZI-ISM, A FULL-FLEDGED FATALISM

Murdered also is friendliness by the German faith in fate. "Reaching for the stars," as Nora Waln so pathetically puts it in her beautiful book on Germany, the Germans fall into the same well with their erstwhile enemies but present allies, the Russians. In the dank of fatalism they there embrace. Comrades and kamerads embrace each with a dagger concealed against the other's heart.

With the Germans the doctrine of inevitability runs to idealism rather than to materialism and depends upon the group rather than upon the universe to guarantee its outcome. Race rather than class is the magic word. The Nordics are destined to rule the world. Let all other races accept this verdict—or accept anyhow. Willy-nilly fate must fulfill itself. If inferiors will not accept the Nordic superiority "willy," they must accept it "nilly."

As instrument of this faith in fate the Nordics must regiment themselves in order to regiment others. The folk, which is to say the pack, must stand close together, each subordinating his will to the will of the leader. Whoever is not willing to be damned for the glory of the folk does not belong to the fold; and so is damned into a concentration camp. This idealism of folkiness in which men nuzzle each other to death, dooms individual men to the futility of fate just as much as does the materialism of Marx. Turn fatalism right side up or up side down and for the human individual it is still wrong side out just the same. For in neither form of it can the individual man do what he would, unless he would do what he must.

Whether, then, the dictator of the proletariat speak in the name of a materialistic universe that rolls on its relentless way or the fuehrer of the folk speak in the name of a race that drives relentlessly to dominate, both are ways of war—of war fated to be because believed to be fated. Freedom of men is lost in the fatalism of either the physical universe or the social order. Such are the fanaticisms of Russia and Germany today. Leaving these two frauds to their fateful embrace of each other, let us return to a land where there is roomy sanity enough to engulf even the half-size fatalism which some Americans profess to feel about war. Why here in America fate itself wears the flowing robes of freedom. Note what our sense of humor has done to the very notion of fate, in these words credited to an American aviator during the World War:

> When you're up in the air, you'll either be flying straight or turning over. If you're flying straight, there's no cause to worry. If you're turning over, you'll either right the plane or you won't. If you right the plane, there's no cause to worry. If you don't one of two things will happen—you'll either be injured or you won't be injured. If you're not injured, there's no cause to worry. If you are injured, you'll be either slightly or seriously injured. If you're slightly injured, there's no cause to worry. If you're seriously injured, one of two things will happen—you'll either die or you'll recover. If you recover, there's no cause to worry—and if you die, you can't.

III. AMERICANISM IS FREEDOM FROM ALL FATALISMS

Let our first act of freedom as Americans be, as our great thinker, William James, suggested, to celebrate our freedom. Nationally we have done just this by passing the wisest Neutrality Act upon which Congress could agree. This is our ancient method of freedom, to talk out our differences and compromise upon what results from the talking. "Democracy is what can be arrived at democratically and not another thing."

The Neutrality Act which resulted from the process of free discussion frees our ships from danger zones and yet saves our farms and factories the right to sell for cash whatever the nations will buy from us in our own marts. By this extension of our trade and this limitation on our traders, we have done what can be done through law to preserve our peace. While doing this at home, we have in our homeland of the Americas agreed with our neighbors to the south that isolation from Europe shall hereafter mean insulation with one another. By converting isolation thus into insulation, we may well turn our previous oscillation in and out of Europe into all-American cooperation. It is easier to live alone and like it when we have plenty of good company.

Thus, at home and throughout our western neighborhood, our only folklore is that of friendliness. The free practice of friendliness, rather than its cosmic prospectus in Russia and its present perversion in Germany—the free practice of friendliness, I repeat, is what has made "just plain folks" in America of those whose ancestors were ancient enemies in Europe. By forbearance of what we do not like in each other and by celebration together of what we do like, we have made this a friendly land of peace among neighbors. The absence of secret police and concentration camps tells us negatively, and the noise of elections on "ham and eggs" and what not else tells us positively, that our American folklore is not of fatalism.

Of what, then, are we Americans now afraid? Of war? But war would come with or without our wills. It could hardly come without our wills. Each warring nation is looking for allies, not one for enemies. We are certainly not likely, then, to be deliberately provoked into this war. That would be the madness of a lunatic who does not know our size, not the madness of a cowardly dictator who picks only upon the weak. No; it is not through that door that we see, or even think we see, the specter of war.

Enemies disposed of, are we afraid of our friends? Of our friends, yes, and of ourselves. Even such fear, however, is hardly fatalistic. There might, indeed, arise conditions in which we would go to war. We know that in advance. We know, for instance, two conditions under which we would will war: (1) Defense of our homeland, and (2) defense of our neighborland of the two Americas. But against those two possible events we have no fatalistic fear. Such fear as we do have we would gladly face down if the hour struck for defense. For that very reason it is not likely to strike.

It is up to us to see to it that other friends do not call us into war—friends beyond our homefolk, I mean, and beyond our American neighbors. These friends we have, of course: of blood, of culture, of religion—friends, in short, of free ways of life more or less like our own. Such friendship, however, is consistent with our permanent independence from war. So long as we believe what we do now clearly believe, that we can be worth more to ourselves and to humanity by staying out, we will stay out of the war. If anything happens to beget this belief in the great majority of us, we will commit ourselves like freemen, not like slaves ordered to a change of heart. Freemen keep themselves of open mind to face changing events without metaphysical fear. We cannot legislate against unpredictable events, and we cannot as freemen insulate ourselves from events that may arise. Freedom means to face what comes, with open eyes and courageous hearts.

What we need most to remember as we turn now together toward the future is this: There is no "little man" on the stairs that is not there. If he comes, we will see him. There is no overpowering cosmic purpose lurking in the crevices of the physical world to subvert us to our doom. That is communistic superstition. Nor is there any malign mischief of malevolence hidden in the folds of the folk to subvert us to an equally witless doom. That is Nazi superstition. Dangers there are, without a doubt, but they all have human carriers recognizable to our wit and so open to denial by our will. Among these dangers are, of course, our own emotions, since legislated neutrality cannot produce psychological impartiality. But we in America still dare the danger of trusting our hearts. While we do not with the Commu-Nazis think with either our blood or our spleen, we do think for our hearts with our heads. Whatever danger there be in this, it is the price we pay to be civilized men.

For civilization itself is sentiment made as wide as man and run as deep down as knowledge. Blind sentiment—sentimentality—would ally us with fate. Sentimentality leads men to do what they think they want to do, only to let them discover in the light of wider knowledge that they really did not want to do it at all. But far-sighted sentiment is not allied with fate; it is the true servant of civilized freedom. It leaves men to do what they want to do with large assurance that they will keep on wanting to have done it. It yields as its precious legacy something worth dying for when life proves impossible with honor; and it yields men something worth living for in trying days like these. Forsaking all fatalisms, then, let us formulate this faith in freedom as our American folklore:

We believe in friendliness to all, that in our life together even the humblest may share in the mystery of morale.

We believe in tolerance for even enemies, that our friendliness may remain roomy and free from both sterility and stickiness.

We believe in competition, that cooperation itself may have and hold its point of growth.

We believe in privacy, that the well-springs of public life may be vital and diverse.

We believe in liberty for all, that fools may get corrected by their own folly, that fanatics may be frustrated by their own narrowness, and that the wise and good may inherit the earth, leading mankind along the high road of peace which like the path of the just is as a shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.

America Must Choose

OF

HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

SPEECH OF HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER, OF MAINE

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech I delivered before annual banquet, Maine Universalist Convention, at Winthrop Street Universalist Church, Augusta, Maine, Monday evening, September 18, 1939:

In accordance with democratic traditions, America is now engaged in a great and solemn referendum. Every citizen has a right and an obligation to study all phases of this problem and express to his elected representative his individual views.

Some who talk most earnestly of the democratic front in Europe seem sometimes most anxious to discard democracy here in the United States.

Let us deny to none the right of free discussion of an issue upon the right decision of which may depend the future not only of America but of the world.

In particular America wishes to know the views of the young men who must carry on the battle, and of their mothers and fathers and wives and sweethearts. After all, they must pay the price.

No one questions the desire or the determination of America to keep out of war until we are convinced our safety is actually at stake. No one has a right to ask American boys to lay down their lives except in defense of America.

The overshadowing issue is whether or not this is or will become America's war. Has the time arrived when America should adopt the doctrine of "collective security"? Is America's frontier on the Rhine? Or is it out in the broad and stormy Atlantic, where George Washington placed it a century and a half ago?

The most subtle propaganda in the current crisis is the suggestion that America must inevitably be involved. That suggestion denies American independence of action. Whatever we do, let us do it as Americans and not because we are compelled to a course of action by influences in other lands.

Whether or not any modification of the existing embargoes is a step toward war is a matter for debate. Until I am persuaded that the safety of America and of American institutions is at stake, I shall labor without ceasing to keep America out of this European holocaust.

That means the question of embargoes is secondary to the main issue of keeping America out of war with or without embargoes.

Let us approach this tragic problem without passion or partisanship of any character. Let us see the problem clearly and let us see it whole.

Let us reach a decision after full and careful discussion and deliberation with an eye single to the future not only of America but of the civilization that we boast.

America may yet be the lost horizon where civilization shall survive. America is obviously now the focus of all the forces that are loosed upon this earth. America once again must face a supreme test. In the churches of America our grandfathers found the answer to their prayers.

Russia closed 25,000 churches by governmental fiat. Christendom was aghast at such a Godless act. Yet America has closed 25,000 churches, not by governmental fiat, but by the indifference of a people who did not choose to go.

Before America goes forth to save the world let us be very sure that we have sought and found the same guidance that has carried America in three centuries to a position of preeminence among the nations of the earth.

New Deal War on Business Goes On

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, rumbles of cannon from abroad, talk of appeasement, fear of American participation, nothing interferes with the New Deal's struggle against American businessmen. For reasons which are utterly inexplicable to the Nation's industrial leaders, President Roosevelt's assistants are waging a relentless warfare against the very enterprises which they must depend upon in any national emergency. There is no threat in the talk of businessmen, but there is deep and ever-widening resentment. They have grown tired of the scapegoat role, bearing labels they consider unjustified.

For 7 years they found themselves the victims of a peculiar process. Laws passed by Congress have dealt with business so frequently that it has become the rule rather than the exception to hear industry bewailing the activities of Capitol Hill. When Congress is in session, with the large Democratic majority still in power, New Deal legislation has made devastating inroads into freedom of private enterprise. But even when Congress has adjourned the process steadily goes on. For the "brain trust" of the White House has created agencies which function day and night throughout the year. They grind out regulations, they lay down rulings, they issue instructions. Like the mail, they work in season and out, good weather and bad.

What they have been doing in the last few months has gone almost completely unnoticed in the horrors of the new war shaping itself in Europe. But, whether it be publicly observed or not, the bureaucracy of the New Deal has been grinding the faces of businessmen just as heavily in the dust as in the days of the first crack down. Today your shop owner must keep posted on congressional legislation, of course. He must employ a trained lawyer to digest the statutes and to keep posted on the daily rulings of the 50 agencies created in Washington since 1933. Changes in the interpretation placed upon legal phrases may hit him crushing blows in the pocketbook. They may affect his advertising slogans; they may destroy his personal arrangements.

In fact, this is precisely what has been happening since last July. Economic planning, so fondly spoken of by our Government officials, has become synonymous with rigid governmental control. The methods of operation, the amounts of production, the prices which may be charged are being so largely determined by governmental activity today that the fiction of economic freedom has been virtually scrapped. Yet, amazingly inconsistently, while Federal governmental bureaus are undertaking these rigid regulations of industry, any effort by industry itself to do the same things is sharply deterred by an omnipresent, omniscient host of sleuths.

Within the last 60 days the Department of Justice, in cooperation with Professor-Assistant Attorney General Thurman Arnold, has indicted fifty-odd manufacturers and trade association officers for a series of offenses. They have been charged with endeavoring to cooperate in the interest of eliminating throat cutting. They have been indicted on the criminal charge of conspiracy to violate the antitrust laws by agreeing on uniform trade practices. Everything for which they are being tried was publicly praised and hailed with loud hosannas by the New Deal itself only a short time ago. In the heyday of N. R. A., the blue eagle floated bravely over the smokestacks now condemned so freely.

Not to be outdone, the Federal Trade Commission has accused cosmetics manufacturers of violating the Robinson-Patman Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act as well. The grievous offense with which they are charged may result in throwing at least 10,000 men and women out of work. They are alleged to have employed sales agents to act as demonstrators in department stores to the great damage of the Republic. Though every man, woman, and child in America, no matter how small the town in which he lives, knows that in stores throughout the country there are folks who demonstrate new appliances, cosmetics, vacuum cleaners, washing machines, and a thousand other devices, the Federal Trade Commission has just discovered the sordid truth. To them a grave deception is being practiced by these demonstrators, for they do not sell on behalf of the department store, but rather on behalf of the manufacturer. For some reason this constitutes a vicious evil, which must be extirpated at the roots. In the extirpation procedure a substantial prison sentence and a juicy fine may be imposed by the overzealousness of our Federal bureaucracy.

Even more irksome to businessman and consumer alike must be the recent ruling of the Trade Commission on another serious issue. A large food manufacturer was found guilty of violating the law because he had sold to one of his biggest customers at a price lower than that which he was charging smaller purchasers. The F. T. C. insists that no differential may be permitted in price for the purpose of inducing purchases in large quantities. The only justification for reducing prices which will satisfy the Commission is a difference in actual costs which can be attributed definitely to the size of the order. Every company selling in interstate business which reduces its charges to any customer takes its future existence in its hands under this ruling. Cost-accounting techniques become a prime factor in determining the result, and if the Commission's methods are different from those used by the company woe betide the company.

It is a fine kettle of fish, indeed, which the bureau chefs are boiling for industry. Hamstrung, discouraged, annoyed, it is no wonder that it requires a war abroad to give us hope of a business revival which will break the bonds that chain us.

No one urges unrestricted, bitter-end industrial individualism these days, though its proponents will always be able to set forth a noble argument in the history of America. But we are rapidly reaching the conclusion that we must have sanity in our regulation—that we must make compromises between State control and individual enterprise in the interest of our future.

The New Deal refuses to compromise. America's voters must write the compromise of 1940 for them.

Correction of Vote on Neutrality Legislation

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to correct the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Friday, November 3, 1939, page 1389 where the roll call on the adoption of the conference report shows my name listed with the "nays." Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye" on that roll call, and voted it so loudly that I feel sure everyone in the Chamber heard my "aye." I ask, therefore, that the permanent RECORD be corrected to show that I voted "aye" on the adoption of the conference report.

Trade Agreement With Venezuela—Helps Big Oil Companies—Hurts Independent Producers

OF

HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, for several years past the American oil industry has faced a very depressing situation. In addition to the general business depression it has had also the problem of overproduction. In order to stabilize the industry, producers in a number of States have voluntarily agreed to proration, whereby the actual output of the industry has been held down to a small percentage of potential production.

This program, while undoubtedly helpful in stabilizing production and prices, has worked a great hardship upon independent producers as well as landowners and farmers in the oil-producing States.

As an example of the extent to which proration has gone, I might cite what has happened in some of the oil fields in my own district. In the Geneseo field, in Rice County, the potential production is 242,030 barrels per day, according to the figures of the Kansas Corporation Commission. Under proration the field is permitted to produce 3,400 barrels per day, or 1¼ percent of its potential. In the Silica field, in Barton and Rice Counties, the potential production is 424,272 barrels per day. The amount permitted to be produced is 13,650, or 3.2 percent of the potential. In the Wherry field, in Rice County, the potential is 78,319 barrels. The allowable is 4,000 barrels, or 5.1 percent of the potential. Substantially the same situation obtains in other fields in central and western Kansas. In some of the older producing fields the percentage is higher, but in every State practicing proration the amount permitted to be produced is only a small percentage of possible production.

This being the case, it is difficult to find any logical excuse for the action of the State Department in concluding the recent trade agreement with Venezuela reducing excise taxes on imported crude petroleum and fuel oil, including gas oil, to one-fourth cent per gallon. This reduction applies to a quota in any calendar year which is not in excess of 5 percent of the total quantity of crude petroleum processed in refineries in continental United States during the preceding calendar year. Imports in excess of this quota are subject to the full tax of one-half cent per gallon, but by the terms of the treaty our Government binds itself not to increase this tax.

Thus, at a time when domestic producers need more protection and a greater share of the American market, the State Department makes a trade agreement which takes away a large part of the inadequate protection which they already had. That, however, is not all. What I want to bring to the attention of the American people, and particularly those who are interested in oil production as independent operators and landowners, is that the oil industry as a whole suffers while two big companies benefit. In 1938, 58.4 percent of all our oil imports were brought in by the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey. The Gulf Co. brought in 22.6 percent. The remaining 19 percent was brought in by other importers in comparatively small quantities. Furthermore, in 1938 oil constituted 74.6 percent of all our imports from Venezuela. Thus it clearly appears that these two great oil companies get practically all of the benefits of this trade agreement as far as concessions to the United States are concerned. The effect of the agreement is to give these two great companies an increased opportunity to control the domestic oil market and to take it away from the domestic producer. It is going to hurt the independent producer and landowner in two ways. First, it reduces the market for American oil; second, it gives these two great oil companies an opportunity to use the Venezuelan oil supply as a weapon to beat down the price they pay for domestic oil.

Another concession will inure to the benefit of these two great oil corporations and to the disadvantage of domestic producers, and that is that Venezuela agrees to permit the free importation of machinery to produce Venezuelan oil, thus keeping down the cost of production and making competition with our producers more severe.

Surely it cannot be argued that it was necessary to reduce the excise tax in order to stimulate our export trade with Venezuela. As a matter of fact, the figures show that our exports to that country have been constantly increasing since the one-half-cent excise tax was imposed, and that for the year 1938 they were the largest in our history. In short, it is most difficult to discover any reason for taking away a large part of the protection of the American oil industry contained in the excise tax as imposed by Congress except an apparent desire to be of assistance to two colossal oil corporations. Whatever the intent may be, that is the result, and the little independent producer and the farmer getting a small income from oil leases and rentals will be the sufferers.

What Goes on With Our Money, Mr. President?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, it is many years since the Supreme Court of the United States declared that emergencies do not justify illegal activity. No doctrine of law would seem to be more firmly established. Yet President Roosevelt has recently undertaken a course of conduct which seems to flout the best-established principles of our law most brazenly.

From the reports which have appeared in newspapers from every section of the land comes the undenied assertion that Mr. Roosevelt has ordered our War and Navy Departments to ignore statutory safeguards against unauthorized expenditures for Army and Navy housing, hospitalization, and reconditioning obsolete vessels. Every one of these items may represent a necessary and salutary expense, but this is not the cause of our quarrel with the White House. We are appalled at the potential consequences of any step taken by our President which transgresses upon our laws.

Title II, section 665, chapter 11, of the United States Code declares that—

> No executive department or other Government establishment of the United States shall expend or involve the Government in any contract or other obligation for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations unless such contract is authorized by law.

What the President has done is simply this: He has decided for himself that since Congress has authorized him to increase the strength of the Army, Navy, and marine forces of the Nation, and to recondition 100 vessels, he has acquired the additional authority to authorize such incidental expenditures as may be required for housing, hospitalization, and reconditioning operations.

It is conceivable to every one of us that "incidental expenditures" may sometimes exceed those to which they are appended. But no matter what may be the amount of these "incidentals" there is no authority whatever vested in any executive officer to multiply appropriations on his own volition. The Constitution requires appropriations to originate in the House of Representatives. Congress is given control of the Nation's purse strings, and no one may loosen them without congressional approval.

We are perturbed at this unprecedented usurpation of power by the White House. We are no less perturbed by the subtle methods employed in achieving it. According to the information before the Nation, the President discussed his proposed technique with Comptroller General Fred H. Brown "informally." Mr. Brown begged the President not to require a "formal ruling." Subsequently Supreme Court Justice Stone and Supreme Court Justice Frankfurter joined the President on a week-end cruise, at which time Mr. Roosevelt told his friends what he intended to do. Their replies are not recorded.

Whatever may be our political faith, there is something here which should not be lightly dismissed. Democrat or Republican, every American citizen, must be deeply concerned when the Nation's Chief Executive begins spending money without the specific authorization of the one governmental unit entrusted with the power to give it.

Congress is in session. Any emergency appropriation could be speedily enacted. Any real need for funds to keep our military forces prepared would find a ready response in the present state of world affairs. Why must our President choose this roundabout approach to a legitimate need?

Yes, Mr. President, what goes on with our money? No less important, what goes on with our constitutional processes of government?

Ludlow Resolution for Referendum on Foreign Wars

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, when Congress reconvenes in January there will be a revival of efforts to secure the enactment of House Joint Resolution 89, a resolution introduced by me which proposes to amend the Constitution so as to give the people of America who have to do the dying and suffering in war and to bear war's unspeakable griefs and costs, a right to vote on the question of sending our boys overseas to participate in foreign wars.

This resolution is coming up for national attention again in January, perhaps supported by more general and widespread favorable opinion and interest than ever before, because it is so everlastingly right and just that, like Banquo's ghost, it will not stay put down.

During the recent perfervid discussion of the neutrality issue, thousands upon thousands of our citizens were saying that they wished from the bottom of their hearts that the Ludlow amendment had been written into the Constitution when it was prominently before Congress last year, as they would have then felt secure that, with the people having a right to vote, there would be no danger of our country being dragged into an overseas war. For many weeks my mail has been flooded with letters asking, and even pleading, that this proposed constitutional amendment be revived and pushed with all possible vigor when the regular session starts in January.

The demand that the people shall have a right to say when our boys shall be sent to fight outside of the Western Hemisphere has been strengthened by the repeated demonstrations of the willingness of Congress to yield to the other end of the Avenue in respect to war and its makings. There is a very widespread belief that the Ludlow amendment would have been adopted and sent on the way to the States for ratification in 1938 if the sledge-hammer blows of the administration had not beaten down a favorable majority into a minority.

SWITCH OF 46 MEMBERS

Then there is the object lesson of what happened in the House the other day when 46 Members who had voted for the munitions embargo switched and voted to repeal the embargo.

A plain fact that should be obvious to everybody is that the existing war-declaring mechanism is undependable in registering the popular will in regard to international relations. Another plain fact is that any President of the United States with the power over international relations which the Constitution now gives him can lead the country into war any time he chooses. The unreliability of Congress as a register of public opinion in emergencies was demonstrated the other day when the embargo on munitions was repealed notwithstanding 80 percent or more of the American people wanted it retained. In crises like these Congress is strangely sensitive and responsive to the Executive will. Before a Nero, a Napoleon, or a Hitler gets in the White House the war power should be transferred by constitutional amendment to the people, where it ought to be in a democracy, for that is where sovereignty abides.

It has been demonstrated, so the advocates of the Ludlow amendment say, that although the Constitution nominally places the war-making power in the Congress, so great is the President's war power over Congress that many Members are always ready to flop and vote as the President wishes them to vote on international affairs.

It is pointed out that this may be all right so long as we have a peace-minded President in the White House, but suppose that some time we have a President who wants war? This question is being asked: If there is so much power inherent in the Presidency that the Chief Executive can prevent the war-referendum resolution from even being discussed on the floor of Congress, and if 46 Members of the House can be induced by Executive persuasion to switch and vote against an embargo provision which he himself once signed and praised, what reason is there to doubt that any President of the United States, at any time in the future, could lead the country into war whenever he may choose to do so, notwithstanding the letter of the Constitution purports to give the war-making power to the Congress alone?

NO CRITICISM OF MR. ROOSEVELT

To thousands—I believe even millions—of good, honest, sincere American citizens there seems to be something wrong with this picture. They have no criticism of President Roosevelt, but they know that we will not have our present peace-loving President always. Most of them have the warmest affection for him, but it does seem to them that in the interest of posterity, even more than in the interest of the present generation, this picture should be changed by substituting for the congressional right—always subject to Executive influence—to declare war, a hard and fixed provision in the Constitution that when it comes to deciding whether we shall send the flower of our manhood to die in slaughter zones overseas the people shall have the say, with women having equal voting rights with men, and with a provision that every boy old enough to be conscripted shall have a right to vote.

What could be more elementally just than that?

TEXT OF LUDLOW AMENDMENT

For the information of those who are not familiar with the Ludlow amendment, House Joint Resolution 89, I set forth its text, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the States as provided in the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. Except in case of invasion by armed forces, actual or immediately threatened by an approaching military expedition, or attack upon the United States or its Territorial possessions, or by any non-American nation against any country in the Western Hemisphere, the people shall have the sole power by a national referendum to declare war or to engage in warfare overseas. Congress, when it deems a national crisis to exist in conformance with this article, shall by concurrent resolution refer the question to the people.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall by law provide for the enforcement of this section.

"SEC. 3. This article shall become operative when ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution."

FORTY-EIGHT MEMBERS SIGN

Forty-eight Members of the House, representing collectively more than 12,000,000 American citizens, have signed a discharge petition, now at the Speaker's desk, to bring this worthy measure out of the Judiciary Committee, where it is being chloroformed, to the floor of the House for debate and a vote. The discharge petition will not become effective unless or until it is signed by 218 Members, a majority of the House, and the task to which we shall have to address ourselves when Congress reconvenes will be the securing of 170 additional signatures to the discharge petition. In this task all of the peace-loving people of the Nation can help by contacting their Members of Congress. Four separate Gallup polls have found a majority of the American people to be in favor of my proposal and there is no doubt that it has the approval of public opinion.

FUNDAMENTAL ARGUMENTS FOR BILL

Now a few words as to the fundamental arguments in support of this proposed change in the Constitution and I am done.

We boast that we are the world's greatest democracy.

What is the meaning of democracy? It means the right of the people to rule themselves—a right which we who subscribe to the faith of the founding fathers believe comes from God Himself.

The Constitution of the United States is the arch stone of our democracy. To round out that immortal charter of freedom, the so-called Ludlow war-referendum amendment is proposed as an addendum and capsheaf of the Bill of Rights.

This proposed constitutional amendment—House Joint Resolution 89—would give the people who have to suffer and, if need be, to die and to bear the awful burdens and costs and griefs of war the right to say whether we shall participate in wars overseas. If the United States or any country in the Western Hemisphere is attacked by a non-American nation, the referendum would not apply, so that this democratic proposal would not in any way, shape, or degree limit or impair our national defense.

When the Bill of Rights was adopted, the means of communication were so slow and imperfect that a referendum on war was obviously not only impractical but impossible. Quick, modern means of communication, including the telegraph, telephone, fast trains, airplanes, and radio, annihilating time and distance, have made a referendum on war practicable.

This proposed plebiscite on foreign wars is the very substance of democracy and would be a proper twentieth-century extension of the Bill of Rights. Our present form of government is a democracy only in reference to domestic affairs. Our democracy stops at the water's edge. In its foreign relations our Government is not a democracy at all, but a pure autocracy. The citizen can vote for constable or dog catcher, or on the location of a water works or pesthouse, but he has no vote on the greatest and most tragic question that can possibly affect him and his loved ones—the question which is to decide whether the manhood of America is to be regimented and sent into the slaughter pens of foreign wars. If our democracy means anything at all, it should apply not only in trivial situations but in matters of transcendental importance involving the breaking up of homes, the severing of family ties, and the hurling of our fine young manhood into the hell of foreign conflicts to settle the disputes of other nations. To contend that the citizen should have a right to vote only on relatively minor and inconsequential things, but not on these great tragic issues, is to confess the weakness and impotency of our democracy.

There are defense wars and there are policy wars. If our country were threatened by a foreign foe, our people would rise en masse to defend it, and no referendum would be expected or required under my proposal, but when it comes to deciding whether it is the best policy to participate in overseas wars of alien origin over boundary disputes and the like, surely those who have to suffer and die and pay the costs ought to have something to say about it. This proposal is not only elemental justice but it is the very essence of democracy and in complete harmony with our American philosophy and traditions.

Declare War on Unemployment and Money Shortage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES C. OLIVER

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the request granted me by unanimous consent on November 3 last to extend my own remarks and to include therein certain excerpts from the speeches of the President with reference to the subject of unemployment, and also certain excerpts with reference to an interview which was given by Thomas Edison and Henry Ford in 1921, I submit the following:

Mr. Speaker, America should declare war now. There is not a Member of this great body who is not fully aware of and disturbed by the economic impasse in which we now find ourselves in this tremendously wealthy Nation of ours. There is not a person in this country who is not fully cognizant of the fact that want in the midst of plenty is a paradox upon which we all should declare uncompromising warfare until economic insecurity and uncertainty shall forever be banished from our land. Foreign affairs are of tremendous import to us at this particular juncture of world history, and this extraordinary session of the Congress must, of course, pay attention to the ways and means whereby this Nation may be insulated against the impact of that foreign madness; but at the same time our domestic problem of unemployment, which is partaking of the nature of a persistent and permanent malignant cancer in our body politic, must be eradicated completely. The failure to declare war now in this direction will inexorably and inevitably lead to an economic civil war among ourselves. Pressure groups, which are increasing in size and demands, are absolute proof and evidence that the first stages of a political protest are now under way and may very well develop into an aggressive rebellion against needless and involuntary unemployment, with its consequent ravages on our social, economic, and physical systems. The surges and impacts of these groups will become stronger and more frequent. We must declare war now and continue war on this unemployment crisis or war will be declared against us by our own people. We, in this great deliberative assembly, are more keenly aware of this than others who constantly call on us for corrective measures.

In this present atmosphere of war hysteria it is most pertinent to consider what causes wars. It is, in the final analysis, that most unnecessary economic dislocation, namely, unemployment. Unemployment means dissatisfaction, suffering, fear, crime, and a longing on the part of the dissatisfied for a Moses, a Hitler, a Lenin, or, as in our own case, in fact, another Washington. Unemployment caused the American Revolution. Had Great Britain given the colonists the privilege of an adequate circulating medium so the colonists could trade with each other without largely using barter, there would have been no Revolutionary War.

In this connection Henry Ford started a campaign to educate the people of this country in a method for the prevention of unemployment and war. He asked the Government to give him a contract to develop Muscle Shoals and loan him $30,000,000 with which to do it, the same to be paid back and the dam to revert to the Government.

Mr. Ford contends that unemployment can be wiped out through the use of enough money to move goods and services in abundance. He contended that if the Government would loan him $30,000,000—which he did not need—he would demonstrate two things: First, that we can produce great public wealth without bonds and bondage, and that when the people once knew that they could complete Muscle Shoals without the expenditure of a dollar of tax or bond, the idea would expand until the flood and power waters of the Nation were harnessed and every idle man would be employed, and that with full employment labor could and would demand and secure its full rights with peace and economic freedom.

For America to make such an example the world would be led to a new conception of life, which would eventually compel an ample monetary supply the world over, with resulting full employment and contentment of the people and the ending of wars.

At Muscle Shoals Mr. Ford, in company with Thomas Edison, gave an interview on the subject of ending wars.

Closely connected with the war and unemployment question there is the matter of the volume and the quality of the money. Excerpts from the interviews of Ford and Edison, which I asked leave to have included in my remarks, refer to these questions. These interviews were published in the New York Times on Tuesday, December 6, 1921, and are as follows:

Mr. Ford said:

"The essential evil of gold, in its relation to war, is the fact that it can be controlled. Break the control and you stop war. The only way to break the control of these international bankers, the way to end their exploitation of humanity forever, is to smash gold as a basis for the currency of the world.

"What did they do a hundred years ago without a gold standard? The idea of gold as a money basis is nothing more nor less than a conception of the bankers. They knew that if they could establish, by law, gold as the basis of currency they could then control the capital of the world because by combining interests to control the world's gold."

"But what have you to substitute?" he was asked.

"That's just where Muscle Shoals comes in," said Mr. Ford; "see what a spectacle we have. Army engineers say it will take $40,000,000 to complete the big dam. But Congress is economical just now and not in a mood to raise the money by taxation. The customary alternative is 30-year bonds at 4 percent. The United States, the greatest Government in the world, wishing $40,000,000 to complete a great public benefit, is forced to go to the money sellers to buy its own money. At the end of 30 years the Government not only has to pay back the $40,000,000, but it has to pay 120 percent interest, literally has to pay $88,000,000 for the use of $40,000,000 for 30 years.

"And all the time it is the Government's own money. The money sellers never created it. They got it from the Government originally. The Government first gave credit, now it must pay for the use of what it gave. Think of it. Could anything be more childish, more unbusinesslike?

WOULD SIMPLY ISSUE CURRENCY

"Now, I see a way by which our Government can get this great work completed without paying a nickel to the money sellers. It is as sound as granite, and there is but one thing hard about it. It is so simple and easy that, maybe, home folks can't see it.

"The Government needs $40,000,000. That is 2,000,000 $20 bills. Let the Government issue those bills and with them pay every expense connected with the completion of the dam. The dam completed, we can set the whole works running, and in a shorter time than you would suppose, the entire $40,000,000 issued can be retired out of the earnings of the plant."

"But suppose the contractor would be unwilling to accept that kind of currency in payment?" he was asked.

"There is not that kind of suppose in the situation at all," said Mr. Ford, smiling. "He would take Government bonds in payment, wouldn't he? Certainly. Here," said the manufacturer, pulling a $20 bill from his pocket, "he wouldn't hesitate about taking that kind of money, would he? Of course not. Well, what is there behind a bond or this bill that makes it acceptable? Simply this, the good faith and credit of the American people, and $20 bills issued by the Government to complete this great public improvement would have just as much of the good faith and credit of the American people behind them as any bond or other American currency ever issued. You see it is just a question of faith in the American people."

"But your plan would upset the money system of the world and might work incalculable harm," he was told.

"Not necessarily, not at all. We need not abolish anything. We need not even abolish the gold standard. Simply forget that there is any such thing as gold standard, and whenever the Government needs money for a great public improvement, instead of thinking of bonds with heavy interest charges think of redeemable non-interest-bearing currency. Do you really see what the interest charges of our Government mount up to? Do you appreciate that 80 cents of every dollar raised by taxation is spent in the payment of interest? The national debt is nothing more nor less than the Nation's interest liability pile. Every public improvement this country makes means an increase to the national debt. Here is a way to get the improvements without increasing the debt. The interest load is breaking down our whole financial system. We've got to stop somewhere."

"But, in a sense, there would be no security behind this kind of money," it was suggested.

"There would be the best security in the world. Here you have a river capable of furnishing 1,000,000 horsepower. It has been here for, say, 100,000,000 years. It will be here as long as there is rain and mountains to shed the rain into the rivers. This energy is wealth in a productive form. Now, which is the more imperishable, the more secure, this power site and its development or the several barrels of gold necessary to make $40,000,000? This site, with its power possibilities, will be here long after the Treasury Building is a ruin."

"But have you worked out a plan of values?"

WOULD USE POWER AS MONEY UNIT

"Yes; we have. We have that ready when Congress wishes to hear about this plan. The standard American dollar is approximately one-twentieth of an ounce of gold. Under the new currency system a certain amount of energy exerted for 1 hour would be equal to $1. It is simply a case of thinking and calculating in terms different than those laid down to us by the international banking group to which we have grown so accustomed that we think there is no other desirable standard. We should change our minds on that question. The only difference between the currency plan and the bond plan is that there is no interest to be paid, and the Wall Street money merchants, who do nothing to build the dam and deserve nothing, will get nothing."

"But how is all this going to stop war?"

"Simply because if tried here at Muscle Shoals this plan will prove so overwhelmingly and amazingly successful that the American people will never again consent to issuance of an interest-bearing bond for a national improvement. When the Government needs money it will raise it by issuing currency against its imperishable natural wealth. Other countries, seeing our success, will undoubtedly do likewise. The function of the money seller will have disappeared."

"What would be the attitude of other countries about accepting this money based on Muscle Shoals?" he was asked.

"There need be no difficulty about that. Some of our currency, even today, is not acceptable to foreign countries in payment of debts; gold is the international basis. Muscle Shoals is a national, not an international, matter. This money would only be for use at home."

"Do you expect that Congress will act favorably on your suggestion?"

"Well, I don't know as to that. Maybe they won't, but I'll bet that the average American citizen will see the righteousness, the soundness, and the common sense of this thing. But, no matter what becomes of this suggestion, I shall act so that no money speculator will make anything out of Muscle Shoals. Even if I have to take up the whole bond issue myself, I will see that the interest goes toward lowering the cost of the product. Understand that I am suggesting how this project can be financed in a better way, but if this is not done, we stand ready to do our utmost to save the people from the enormous interest charges by taking it ourselves and turning it back.

"My ambition is not to own Muscle Shoals but to complete it, develop it, get it working, and then fix it so that it can never be exploited for private ends but shall always remain in the service of all the people, their own property, operated for their own benefit."

SUPPORT OF FORD'S CURRENCY PLAN

On the point of Mr. Ford's suggestion to the Government for financing the completion of the dam, Mr. Edison reiterated his belief, expressed yesterday, that it was a good plan, and that if once the currency method is tried in raising money for public improvements the country will never go back to the bond method.

"Gold is a relic of Julius Caesar and interest is an invention of Satan," Mr. Edison continued. "Gold is intrinsically of less utility than most metals. The probable reason why it is retained as the basis of money is that it is easy to control. And it is the control of money that constitutes the money question. It is the control of money that is the root of all evil."

"How can this system be improved or changed?" Mr. Edison was asked.

"It can come about in several ways. One way would be to produce so much gold that its psychological hold would be broken. If we all had mines in our back yards or if synthetic gold could be made and sold for 10 cents a pound, you would soon see gold disappear as the basis for money. And we are nearing just that; only a few days ago a scientist developed that lead, one of the basic metals, and heretofore an element by itself, is actually a compound. We do not know how near we are from finding that gold, too, is a compound. All the wealth in the world, according to our present standards, may be rendered worthless by the discovery that gold can be made synthetically.

"In that case people could no longer have confidence in it. Money ought to be plentiful and gold is not plentiful. It would be plentiful if it were mined in as large quantities as it could be, but an artificial scarcity is maintained by those who use gold to monopolize money.

"That is one way to do it—make it so plentiful that it drowns its fictitious value and drowns the superstition of the people along with it.

WOULD FORGET ABOUT GOLD

"Then there is another way—the method my friend Ford proposed the other day. He proposes just to go along and forget about gold. He says tha' the Government can finance Muscle Shoals without applying to money brokers for permission, and I think he is absolutely right about it.

"Of course, as long as the world is on the gold basis, we shall have to recognize it as an element in international trade, but it is not necessary for commerce within our own borders. In internal business we can forget it. And we do forget it. If everybody in the United States suddenly demanded gold for their money, there would not be enough gold.

"Gold and money are separate things, you see. Gold is the trick mechanism by which you can control money.

"Gold is not money until the people of the United States and other nations put their stamp on it. It is not the gold that makes the dollar. It is the dollar that makes the gold. Take the dollar out of the gold, and leave it merely yellow metal, and it sinks in value. Gold is established by law, just as silver was, and gold could be disestablished, demonetized by law, just as silver was. When silver was demonetized the former so-called dollar became worth about 50 cents."

"But would not Mr. Ford's suggestion that Muscle Shoals be financed by a currency issue raise some objection?" Mr. Edison was asked.

"Certainly. There is a complete set of misleading slogans kept on hand for just such outbreaks of common sense among the people. The people are so ignorant of what they think are the intricacies of the money system that they are easily impressed by big words. There would be new shrieks of 'fiat money' and 'paper money' and 'greenbackism,' and all the rest of it—the same old cries with which the people have been shouted down from the beginning.

"Maybe they can't shout down American thinkers any longer. The only dynamite that works in this country is the dynamite of a sound idea. I think we are getting a sound idea on the money question. The people have an instinct which tells them that something is wrong and that the wrong somehow centers in money. They have an instinct, also, which tells them when a proposal is made in their interests or against them.

BASED ON SOIL AND ENERGY

"Now, as to paper money, so-called, everyone knows that paper money is the money of civilized people. The higher you go in civilization the less actual money you see. It is all bills and checks. What are bills and checks? Mere promises and orders. What are they based on? Principally on two sources—human energy and the productive earth. Humanity and the soil—they are the only real basis of money.

"Don't allow them to confuse you with the cry of 'paper money.' The danger of paper money is precisely the danger of gold—if you get too much, it is no good. They say we have all the gold of the world now. Well, what good does it do us? When America gets all the chips in a game the game stops. We would be better off if we had less gold. Indeed, we are trying to get rid of our gold to start something going. But the trade machine is at present jammed. Too much paper money operates the same way. There is just one rule for money, and that is to have enough to carry all the legitimate trade that is waiting to move. Too little or too much are both bad. But enough to move trade, enough to prevent stagnation on the one hand and not enough to permit speculation on the other hand is the proper ratio."

"Then you see no difference between currency and Government bonds?" Mr. Edison was asked.

"Yes; there is a difference, but it is neither the likeness nor the difference that will determine the matter; the attack will be directed against thinking of bonds and currency together and comparing them. If people ever get to thinking of bonds and bills at the same time, the game is up.

"Now, here is Ford proposing to finance Muscle Shoals by an issue of currency. Very well; let us suppose for a moment that Congress follows his proposal. Personally I don't think Congress has imagination enough to do it, but let us suppose that it does. The required sum is authorized—say $30,000,000. The bills are issued directly by the Government, as all money ought to be. When the workmen are paid off they receive these United States bills. When the material is bought it is paid in these United States bills. Except that perhaps the bills may have the engraving of a water dam instead of a railroad train and a ship, as some of the Federal Reserve notes have. They will be the same as any other currency put out by the Government, that is, they will be money. They will be based on the public wealth already in Muscle Shoals, and their circulation will increase that public wealth; not only the public money but the public wealth—real wealth.

"When these bills have answered the purpose of building and completing Muscle Shoals they will be retired by the earnings of the power dam; that is, the people of the United States will have all that they put into Muscle Shoals and all that they can take out for centuries—the endless wealth-making water power of that great Tennessee River—with no tax and no increase of the national debt."

"But suppose Congress does not see this, what then?" Mr. Edison was asked.

"Well, Congress must fall back on the old way of doing business. It must authorize an issue of bonds. That is, it must go out to the money brokers and borrow enough of our own national currency to complete great national resources, and we then must pay interest to the money brokers for the use of our own money.

OLD WAY ADDS TO PUBLIC DEBT

"That is to say, under the old way any time we wish to add to the national wealth we are compelled to add to the national debt.

"Now, that is what Henry Ford wants to prevent. He thinks it is stupid, and so do I, that for the loan of $30,000,000 of their own money the people of the United States should be compelled to pay $66,000,000—that is what it amounts to with interest. People who will not turn a shovelful of dirt nor contribute a pound of material will collect more money from the United States than will the people who supply the material and do the work. That is the terrible thing about interest. In all our great bond issues the interest is always greater than the principal. All of the great public works cost more than twice the actual cost on that account. Under the present system of doing business, we simply add 120 to 150 percent to the stated cost.

"But here is the point: If our Nation can issue a dollar bond, it can issue a dollar bill. The element that makes the bond good makes the bill good also. The difference between the bond and the bill is that the bond lets the money brokers collect twice the amount of the bond and an additional 20 percent, whereas the currency pays nobody but those who directly contribute to Muscle Shoals in some useful way.

"If the Government issues bonds, it simply induces the money brokers to draw $30,000,000 out of the other channels of trade and turn it into Muscle Shoals; if the Government issues currency, it provides itself with enough money to increase the national wealth at Muscle Shoals without disturbing the business of the rest of the country. And in doing this it increases its income without adding a penny to its debt.

"It is absurd to say that our country can issue $30,000,000 in bonds and not $30,000,000 in currency. Both are promises to pay; but one promise fattens the usurer, and the other helps the people. If the currency issued by the Government were no good, then the bonds issued would be no good either. It is a terrible situation when the Government, to increase the national wealth, must go into debt and submit to ruinous interest charges at the hands of men who control the fictitious values of gold.

"Look at it another way. If the Government issues bonds, the brokers will sell them. The bonds will be negotiable; they will be considered as gilt-edged paper. Why? Because the Government is behind them, but who is behind the Government? The people. Therefore it is the people who constitute the basis of Government credit. Why then cannot the people have the benefit of their own gilt-edged credit by receiving non-interest-bearing currency on Muscle Shoals instead of the bankers receiving the benefit of the people's credit in interest-bearing bonds?"

SAYS PEOPLE MUST PAY ANYWAY

"The people must pay anyway; why should they be compelled to pay twice, as the bond system compels them to pay? The people of the United States always accept their Government's currency. If the United States Government will adopt this policy of increasing its national wealth without contributing to the interest collector—for the whole national debt is made up of interest charges—then you will see an era of progress and prosperity in this country such as could never have come otherwise."

"Are you going to have anything to do with outlining this proposed policy?" Mr. Edison was asked.

"I am just expressing my opinion as a citizen," he replied. "Ford's idea is flawless. They won't like it. They will fight it, but the people of this country ought to take it up and think about it. I believe it points the way to many reforms and achievements which cannot come under the old system."

The ideal money advocated by Messrs. Ford and Edison would have been wealth money issued against the newly produced wealth which would have been created at Muscle Shoals and could have been extended likewise to every other great productive project. This wealth money would have been paid into circulation as the projects advanced and would have been retired as financial returns came in from the completed project. In the case of nonproductive projects the same money procedure could be followed, but the retirement of the money issued to complete such would necessarily come from tax receipts.

Mr. Ford proposed to complete the Muscle Shoals project for $30,000,000 in new paper money. The Norris-Roosevelt project at Tennessee Valley has cost the United States in bonds $231,066,000, of which $99,358,380 has been in the form of direct bond issues and $131,707,620 in indirect issues. This statement is based on the present Federal financial practice of paying its expenses through the medium of borrowed money to the extent of 43 percent and the balance of 57 percent by cash revenues. If there were not any T. V. A. then our total expenses would be that much less; therefore our contention that it may be considered that T. V. A., which had its inception in the Muscle Shoals plant, has cost the United States at the present time nearly a quarter of a billion dollars in bonds. With another $40,000,000 authorized and appropriated and still more to come, we realize that the interest charges under our present obeisance to the bond method of finance will double the principal cost of this wealth-producing project.

The debt-money system employed in the T. V. A. project, against which Ford and Edison both enveighed, is largely responsible for the unemployment and war problems of this Nation and the world. As a matter of fact, it is my considered judgment that the present European conflict is being waged and continued because of the determination of the money lenders that the unconventional internal money system of Germany shall not be extended to the orthodox and status quo nations of the world. It is my sincere belief that the President is not unaware of the potent influence which unemployment exercises in the business of war. It is interesting and timely to call attention to the importance which Mr. Roosevelt places on this problem of unemployment. Let me quote several of the "57 varieties" of statements which he has made in this connection.

In the Presidential campaign address in Detroit, October 2, 1932, I read:

> The problem in the long run—and I am not talking about the emergency of this year but the problem of unemployment in the long run—can be and shall be solved by the human race.

With ten to twelve millions who want work still idle, the question has not been settled by the human race 7 years later, nor has there been a dent made in the solution.

In a campaign address of October 13, 1932, he said:

> I have recounted to you in other speeches, and it is a matter of general information, that for at least 2 years after the crash the only efforts made by the national administration to cope with the distress of unemployment were to deny its existence. When finally this year, after attempts at concealment and minimizing had failed, when they were at last forced to recognize the fact of suffering among millions of unemployed, appropriations of Federal funds for assistance to States were finally made.

Candidate Roosevelt more or less justly criticized President Hoover, but after 6 years of new dealism we still have the ten millions to twelve millions who want work still unemployed, with an administration minimizing and concealing the gravity of the situation.

Again, in the Presidential campaign address in Atlanta, Ga., October 24, 1932, he says:

I believe that we can restore prosperity here in this country by reestablishing the purchasing power of half of the people of the country; that when this gigantic market of 50,000,000 people is able to purchase goods industry will start to turn and the millions of men and women now walking the streets will be employed.

Bravo! Great! Great, Mr. President! Wonderful campaign belief. Yet with ten to twelve million idle who would work if they could, after 6 years of your administration you have proved that you either cannot give or are unwilling to give those 50,000,000 purchasing power.

In another Presidential campaign speech at Baltimore, Md., October 25, 1932, we note:

Mr. Hoover apparently has come to believe that 10,000,000 people of the United States must remain unemployed unless the Government provides employment for all of them. The exact meaning of his statement is, if I understand the English language correctly, that there is no hope for a restoration of normal employment for these 10,000,000 people.

Despair is written all over this statement of the President. A despairing cry which says to the 10,000,000 American unemployed that normal employment is not in sight. * * * He apparently feels that the way to restore the spirit of the American people is to tell the unemployed—the vast, weary army of unemployed—that they are going to remain unemployed.

Candidate Roosevelt told the idle—that vast, weary army of unemployed—they would have employment, but after 7 years there are still ten to twelve million unemployed, all of whom want work, but the President has no relief for them unless it be at war.

Speaking of President Hoover's faith that something would turn the tide of unemployment, Candidate Roosevelt, at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York City, November 3, 1932, said:

Faith and hope are splendid things, but the hunger and suffering of millions of unemployed men are too insistent to justify a governmental policy that pins its faith on such a mere remote possibility.

Yet President Roosevelt, too, asks ten to twelve million unemployed to have faith today.

In President Roosevelt's annual message to Congress, January 4, 1935, we read:

But the stark fact before us is that great numbers still remain unemployed.

A large proportion of these unemployed and their dependents have been forced on the relief rolls. The burden on the Federal Government has grown with great rapidity. * * * Work must be found for able-bodied but destitute workers.

The Federal Government must and shall quit this business of relief.

I am not willing that the vitality of our people be further sapped by giving of cash, of market baskets, of a few hours of weekly work cutting grass, raking leaves, or picking up papers in the public parks. We must preserve not only the bodies of the unemployed from destitution but also their self-respect, their self-reliance and courage and determination. This decision brings me to the problem of what the Government should do with approximately 5,000,000 unemployed now on the relief rolls.

Those pledges are still unfulfilled, with ten to twelve millions unemployed.

Another time, in informal remarks to State Works Progress administrators, Washington, D. C., June 17, 1935, President Roosevelt says:

I stress the need of making clear to the people in your own States the common objective, the congressional intent and mine to put these unemployed to work during the coming year for a given sum of money. This sum is not elastic, but definite, a fixed appropriation of the Congress. We all hope there is going to be a very definite and distinct pick-up all over the United States. We are working slowly but very surely toward the elimination of the major unemployment problem we have had during these past few years. Of course, we always will have a certain number of unemployed with us, but nothing like the present scale, we hope. And this year, I believe, is going to be the beginning of the picking up of the greater part of this unemployment slack from which we have been suffering.

What a tumble the President's "hopes" took in 1937 and also today with ten to twelve millions still unemployed. "Of course," says the President, "we will always have a certain number of unemployed with us." Very consoling is that in a Nation which guarantees life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to all its citizens. We all know that this guaranty means nothing to people who are unemployed, and we further know that this great guaranty for those who are employed is seriously jeopardized with millions out of work.

In an address at San Diego, Calif., October 2, 1935, the President said:

In the midst of the greatest and most disastrous of these depressions, the very foundation of individual life was crumbling in the spring of 1935 because of the appalling increase in suffering and destitution due to the fact of unemployment.

And 4 years later the disastrous effects go on, with ten to twelve millions unemployed and a war boom now relied upon as the only hope of giving work to a few.

In a message to Congress the President, recommending an appropriation for relief of unemployment, March 18, 1936, stated:

There are at present approximately 5,300,000 families and unattached persons who are in need of some form of assistance—3,800,000 families and unattached persons on the works program and 1,500,000 on local and State relief rolls. Every thinking person knows that this problem of unemployment is the most difficult one before the country.

It is, indeed, proving to be a difficult one with ten to twelve millions unemployed who want work today.

In an address before the Young Democratic Club of Maryland, at Fifth Regiment Armory, Baltimore, Md., April 13, 1936, the President said:

You and I know the simple fact that, while production was increasing and profits were increasing in 1928 and 1929, unemployment was growing at an astounding rate. * * * Because the practices of employment definitely affect the problem of unemployment the Government must give and will give consideration to such subjects as the length of the working week, the stability of employment on an annual basis, and the payment of at least adequate minimum wages. A government doing that is a government that is working actively at the answers to your problem.

Why does the President not end the disgrace of ten to twelve million unemployed?

Again, in his first annual message to Congress, January 3, 1936, the President declared:

In other words, let action be positive and not negative. The way is open in the Congress of the United States for an expression of opinion by yeas and nays. * * * Shall we say to the several millions of unemployed citizens who face the very problem of existence—yes, of getting enough to eat—"We will withdraw from giving you work; we will turn you back to the charity of your communities and to those men of selfish power who tell you that perhaps they will employ you if the Government leaves them strictly alone"? Shall we say to the needy unemployed, "Your problem is a local one except that perhaps the Federal Government, as an act of mere generosity, will be willing to pay to your city or to your county a few grudging dollars to help to maintain your soup kitchens"?

Ten to twelve millions unemployed desire work, still testifying to your ungenerous hand-outs.

Again, in a speech accepting Democratic nomination for President, in Philadelphia, June 27, 1936, Candidate Roosevelt stated:

We are poor, indeed, if this Nation cannot afford to lift from every recess of American life the dread fear of the unemployed that they are not needed in the world. * * *

But, Mr. President, ten to twelve millions of unemployed are looking for your "lift."

From a radio address from the White House, September 6, 1936, we have these words:

We do not surrender our responsibility to the unemployed. We have had ample proof that it is the will of the American people that those who represent them in National, State, and local Government should continue as long as necessary to discharge that responsibility.

Step up, Mr. President. There are still ten to twelve millions who want work.

In a Presidential campaign address at Forbes Field, Pittsburgh, Pa., October 1, 1936, the following appears:

When the new management (Roosevelt administration) came to Washington we began to make our plans—plans to meet the immediate crisis and plans that would carry the people of the country back to decent prosperity.

We saw the millions out of work, the business concerns running in the red, the banks closing.

You can still see ten to twelve millions wanting work. We have just taught them to half starve, to be illy housed and illy clothed, and not to complain.

In a Presidential campaign address at Kansas City, October 13, 1936, Mr. Roosevelt said:

We no longer believe that human beings hit by flood, drought, unemployment, or other national disaster should be left to themselves with the sole help of such charity as may be locally available to them.

Then we should do something about the ten to twelve millions of unemployed who want work.

President Roosevelt's speech in Casper, Wyo., September 24, 1937, is illuminating:

There is nothing like the unemployment today that existed when I came into office.

Still ten to twelve millions who want work.

In another annual message to Congress, January 6, 1937, President Roosevelt remarks:

Of course, the most far-reaching and the most inclusive problem of all is that of unemployment and the lack of economic balance, of which unemployment is at once the result and the symptom. The immediate question of adequate relief for the needy unemployed who are capable of performing useful work I shall discuss with the Congress during the coming months. The broader task of preventing unemployment is a matter of long-range evolutionary policy. To that we must continue to give our best thought and effort. We cannot assume that immediate industrial and commercial activity which mitigates present pressures justifies the National Government at this time in placing the unemployment problem in a filing cabinet of finished business.

The names of the ten to twelve millions of unemployed who want work and cannot find it are in the President's filing cabinet.

In a radio address from the White House, prior to unemployment census, November 14, 1937, the President declared:

Enforced idleness, embracing any considerable portion of our people, in a nation of such wealth and natural opportunity, is a paradox that challenges our ingenuity. Unemployment is one of the bitter and galling problems that now afflicts mankind.

Why not end unemployment and put the ten to twelve millions of unemployed to work? You promised to, Mr. President. Take the question out of the filing cabinet and act.

In another radio address from the White House, prior to unemployment census, November 14, 1937, we have:

I am confident that this Nation of ours has the genius to reorder its affairs and possesses the physical resources to make it possible for everyone, young or old, to enjoy the opportunity to work and earn. There is neither logic nor necessity for one-third of our population to have less of the needs of modern life than make for decent living.

It is my opinion that the genius of the New Deal does not want the ten to twelve millions of unemployed to have work; otherwise they would provide it.

In his Presidential campaign address at Forbes Field, Pittsburgh, Pa., October 1, 1936, Roosevelt says:

[In 1936] on top of having to meet the ordinary expenses of government, I recognize the obligation of the Federal Government to feed and take care of the growing army of homeless and destitute unemployed.

The President still has ten to twelve millions who need "feed" and work.

In a radio address from the White House—prior to unemployment census—November 14, 1937, he shows his passing interest:

This unemployment problem is one in which every individual and every economic group has a direct interest. It is a problem whose discussion must be removed from the field of prejudice to the field of logic. We should find the solution only when we have the facts and, having the facts, accept our mutual responsibilities.

Here the President is in want of the facts. He found them to be in his census of unemployment of eleven millions and over. In a press conference he admitted there were probably three and a half millions more, making a total of fourteen and a half millions. Remember the President's claim, "We planned it that way."

Extemporaneous remarks at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., November 2, 1936:

We cannot reach a millennium or Utopia in any 4 years, or 8 years, but at least I have felt that people in responsible positions ought to start the ball rolling; that they ought to make an effort, through legislation and through public opinion, in a perfectly normal, sane, sensible way, to provide security—security for people within themselves, so that they would not individually worry; security for their families; security for their homes; and a greater security for their jobs. And, incidentally, a greater security for the people who employ them.

Opportunity for work can be guaranteed without war when this administration or some succeeding one determines to put into practice the money suggestions made by Henry Ford and Thomas Edison. Such attempts to this end, however, as have been presented in the form of printed bills have been definitely committed to the doghouse by the brain advisers of the President and in their place have been enacted the patchwork legislation with which the industry of this Nation is struggling today.

In a radio address from the White House—prior to unemployment census—November 14, 1937, the President states:

The report card, which the postman will leave at your door on Tuesday, is a double post card, larger than the customary card. It is addressed especially to those who are unemployed or partly unemployed, and who are able to work and are seeking work. This card carries a message to you from me, carrying the assurance that if you will give me all the facts, it will help us in planning for the benefit of those who need and want work and do not have it now.

You now have the facts, Mr. President, of from ten to twelve millions of unemployed today.

In an address to annual meeting of Mobilization for Human Needs March 11, 1938, the President said:

But when, in 1933, we faced the fact that nearly one out of every three able-bodied workers in America had no job, we had to face the added fact that it was the system which was out of gear.

We ask of you, Mr. President, that you lead the way in a real attempt to fix the system which is now out of gear in order to give every person work who wants work, without resorting to war.

President Roosevelt's address to annual meeting of Mobilization for Human Needs March 11, 1938, asserts:

The importance of these employable millions may be fully understood, perhaps, when it is realized that approximately one-third of them are under 25 years of age and will be either assets or liabilities for many years to come, depending upon public policies toward them. If we do not give them a chance at something like normal living, it is inevitable that they will become millions of individual problems. For these able-bodied unemployed, I am definitely committed to the giving of jobs instead of relief.

The President seems to realize the gravity of these ten to twelve millions being unemployed. Why does he not act? Is he waiting for a war just around the corner?

In the Presidential address in Covington, Ky., July 8, 1938, we have:

I will not go into the story of these 6 years. You know that your bank deposits are safe; that the problem of unemployment is far less serious; that more wheels of industry are turning; that the farmers are better off in a hundred ways; and, most important of all, that our people are not half-clothed or half-starving.

We know, Mr. President, that nothing is settled with ten to twelve millions of unemployed, and that nothing is better off. Let us consider the tables of unemployment from 1917 to this date:

The above figures are compiled from careful research.

From the A. F. of L. we secure the following figures:

1920	1,401,000
1922	3,441,000
1923	1,532,000
1925	1,775,000
1926	1,669,000

1929	1,864,000
1930	4,770,000
1931	8,738,000
1932	13,182,000
1933	13,723,000
1934	12,095,000
1935	10,052,000
Census	11,032,000
President Roosevelt's personal figures	14,532,000
1939 (A. F. of L. figures, approximate)	10,335,000

From these figures we can figure an average unemployment of 396,000 under Wilson's last term and average unemployment under succeeding Presidents as follows:

Harding-Coolidge	2,889,500
Coolidge	1,924,750
Hoover, with Republican Congress	3,317,000
Hoover, with Democratic Congress	10,960,000
Hoover (complete term)	6,167,000
Roosevelt, average, first term	11,466,250
Roosevelt, average second term (approximate)	12,000,000

The cold figures of any reputable agency, even the President's own agencies, show average unemployment to be greater under Roosevelt than under Hoover from two to four times.

I am not trying to defend Hoover's watchful waiting "around the corner." He failed to end unemployment but using the same scoreboard President Roosevelt, with all the latter's bluster and 57 declarations against unemployment, has more signally failed than did President Hoover.

In his Presidential message to Congress on recovery and relief April 14, 1938, Roosevelt says:

> During the processes of overspeculation and overproduction—in the twenties—millions of people had been put to work, but the products of their hands had exceeded the purchasing power of their pocketbooks, with the result that huge surpluses, not only of crops but also of buildings and goods of every kind, overhung the market. Under the inexorable law of supply and demand, supplies so overran demand which would pay that production was compelled to stop. Unemployment and closed factories resulted.

Possibly the President thinks he is doing his best, but his best is not good enough when ten to twelve millions are unemployed.

In a consultation with President Hoover, Henry Ford answered the question of "inexorable law of supply and demand" which President Roosevelt mentions in the paragraph above. Ford's solution which was given the widest publicity at the time is given in part as follows:

> Another reason is that American production had come to equal and to surpass not our people's power to consume but their power to purchase. This is not the same thing as the overproduction of goods; it is undersupply of purchasing power.
> Overproduction can never occur until every need is supplied, but the first need is the need of money. Money in the people's hands represents purchasing power. In this country the purchasing power of the people has been practically used up and still they have not been able to buy all that they must have. I, therefore, suggest the need of increasing the purchasing power of our principal customers—the American people.
> This may be done in two ways, first, by putting additional value into goods or reducing prices to the level of actual values; and, second, starting a movement to increase the general wage level. Nearly everything in this country is too high-priced. The only thing which should be high-priced in this country is the man who works. Wages must not come down; they must not even stay on their present level; they must go up.
> And even that is not sufficient of itself—we must see to it that the increased wages are not taken away from our people by increased prices that do not represent increased values. The country gains no benefit by letting the workingman earn an extra hundred dollars and then taking it away from him again in increased rents and a rise in prices generally.

Following the White House conference, a dispatch from the Detroit office of the Ford Motor Co. confirmed the Ford policy in the following words:

> The increase in wages for Ford employees which Henry Ford announced at Washington today is soon to be made effective has been under consideration for several weeks, it was said in the company's offices here today. * * *
> A minimum wage in the Ford organization of $5 a day was established by Henry Ford in 1914. His philosophy that lower price levels and higher wages are the greatest stimuli to good business is well known in industrial circles.

The President was told by the greatest practical economist in American history, an outstanding American of demonstrated ability, how to end unemployment and disaster.

President Hoover, however, did not heed these wise words of the richest man in the world, whose philosophy of putting everyone to work and preventing even the possibility of war was to raise the purchasing income of the producing worker and reduce the price of fabricated merchandise.

Even a sixth-grade school child could understand that if you lower the price of fabricated merchandise people can and will buy more, and in buying more will put more people to work, and that if the prices go low enough, every person would be employed.

In this day you hear many say: "Prices must go up. We must at least advance to the 1926 price level," with its millions of unemployed. Henry Ford says: "No; you must lower the prices of fabricated merchandise."

If you raise the wage and do not raise the price of fabricated merchandise, the people will have more to spend, and in spending more they will consume more goods, which will require the unemployed to go to work to produce the needed goods. That is simple, and that is the Ford philosophy to end unemployment. In other words, the spread between labor cost of fabricated merchandise and consumer's price is too great.

You may say that you cannot raise the wage of the laborer and income of the farmer without raising the consumer price of fabricated merchandise. Henry Ford all but says you must if you would end unemployment.

While Mr. Ford does not say just how he would raise wages and lower the price of fabricated merchandise, it is evident, from his known opposition to interest and taxes, that he would wipe out interest and taxes in the purchase price of fabricated merchandise.

With an interest and tax bill in the Nation of $32,000,000,000 and a production of wealth—wholesale—of sixty billion, it is evident that 50 percent of the average cost of fabricated merchandise is interest and taxes. Eliminate these items and pass the benefits to the laborer and consumer.

Mr. Ford's plentiful supply of money, as advocated, would as it passed into circulation start to lower the interest rate as money thawed out the hoards. This new supply of wealth-money would flow into circulation until money, which now, as Prodhon, celebrated French economist, says, blocks the door to commerce like a tollgate would become the mover of goods and services, unhindered, unafraid.

Then take all the taxes off of industry—off the produce of the smallest farmer to the greatest—from the smallest shoe-repair shop to the largest shoe factory. From every stock or store of merchandise, unfetter it from the tax burden laid on industry and the consumer from the consumer's tax. Then and only then can you lower the price of fabricated merchandise and raise the income of the producing farmer and worker.

President Hoover's watchful waiting at the corner failed.

President Roosevelt's fanfare, bluster, and "brain trusters" have also failed.

Probably Roosevelt's former Secretary of the Treasury, Woodin, expressed the thought and desired position Candidate Roosevelt wished to take, when giving an inspired interview on the Roosevelt candidacy in 1932, said:

> The big owner and the small consumer to him are just like himself—each entitled to a fair treatment and a square deal.

Well, the President has given the big owner his biggest dividends. The idle-money holders have been given their biggest and best investment in $25,000,000,000 of United States bonds which pay to the big boys at the top a net return of from two to four times the usual net dividends of industry. Real nice for those in the upper brackets to get Government-bond returns equaling 14 percent in private industry. The President has taken care of the big boys with prosperity for the few—

Prosperity, that lives in opulence
Upon another's toil,
Prosperity, that takes the cream of earth
From those who till the soil,
Prosperity that dries the mother's breast
That robs the babe unborn,
Prosperity that functions at its best
When countless thousands mourn.

Recently there appeared in a partisan newspaper a large cartoon depicting the evils of foreign war and containing an outline of our domestic problems which its editor terms as unemployment, industrial strife, low standards of living, hunger, and sickness. A wonderful cartoon it was, showing these problems in the form of men as grim enemies of society and pitted against these six foes stood Uncle Sam with clenched fist. But read in vain; not one word was given as to the method or the weapon which might be used to combat these evils and win the struggle for capitalistic democracy, which, in my opinion, comprises the issue with which we are faced. Today, all acknowledge the evil of unnecessary and involuntary unemployment, but nobody faces it or offers a real basic solution. Ford offered a realistic approach some years ago.

How can Roosevelt give prosperity to the ten or twelve millions of unemployed and at the same time give away the birthright of the farmers and laborers in the form of Government debt money to the bondholders to own and collect on as their property. It just is not in the cards. Both cannot be done. But we can pay off those who now hold the present debt of the Government by making possible honest work for the unemployed on a real earning and productive basis. Debt will never be met unless this country goes back to work. Furthermore, people will not go back permanently to work under the present practice of creating additional debt money through the medium of nonproductive governmental operations.

Are we to drift along until the unemployed find a leader like a Hitler, who arises on the injustices meted out to millions of people and who arouses their prejudices against some bogey as a target until, in a position of power, he gives work to all in the business of distributing death and destruction? Shall we wait until the growing army of the unemployed, because of its very misery and desperation, welcomes such a tyranny in this country?

Mr. Speaker, this is our problem, and if the present leadership will do nothing about it except indulge in more promises and high-sounding words of futuristic hope, then we are challenged to move in with the combined intelligence of the membership of this body and offer the money reform which this great Nation of ours must adopt.

Foreign wars are not the answer. Wars anywhere which take the lives of a single man, woman, or child are not the answer. But a war on the combined enemies of unemployment, low standards of living, industrial strife, hunger, and sickness is the answer. To win such a war we must adopt the tactics which those great generals of industry and science, Ford and Edison, have recommended, namely:

(1) Put new wealth and interest-free money, redeemable in goods, services, and taxes, into circulation.

(2) Make production the basis of our money system in the place of debt.

(3) Stop all bond issues for nonproductive and destructive purposes.

(4) Raise the incomes of all labor to an annual standard commensurate with capacity to produce.

(5) Lower the price of fabricated merchandise to the consumer.

An aggressive war waged along these lines will forever end involuntary unemployment and destructive wars.

Whether Henry Ford does or does not practice what he preaches is beside the question. He made a rule to correct the evil 10 years ago, and it is the only method that can correct the evil. With interest and taxes each appearing a thousand times in the construction of an automobile, and in some instances pyramided, it might be possible that Mr. Ford could not do what he wants to do. On the other hand, we need an economic policy which will both allow and compel Mr. Ford and every other producer of fabricated merchandise to follow the Ford rule.

O. K., Let's Adjourn Politics—No Third Term

OF
HON. GEORGE H. BENDER
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt has proposed that the Members of Congress adjourn politics in the interests of national safety during these trying days. He has wisely and forcefully pointed out the dangers which may be contained in any partisan attitude toward international affairs. European governments may interpret our American tradition of vigorous debate as an evidence of disunity. They may erroneously construe our desire for a thorough airing of every issue as an indication of weakness. To avoid these possibilities we are all ready to adjourn politics on foreign affairs.

But while we are on the subject, Mr. President, it appears to us that the adjournment of politics which you propose might be best achieved by one unequivocal statement from you. To eliminate all the political unrest within the Democratic Party, to give the Nation an opportunity to stop fretting over its next candidates for the Presidency, to present us with a breathing spell during which we may all devote our attention to solving our major problems, instead of framing futile guesses over your own aspirations, a simple "I do not choose to run" would be of inestimable value.

All that is required of you is a decision to uphold the unwritten tradition of our American Government, the tradition which has placed an irrevocable taboo on a third term for our American Presidents. With the third-term bogey out of the way, both the Republicans and the Democrats in our Congress would be ready to talk freely and frankly with you, Mr. President. They would not insist, as they so frequently do, that your foreign policy is prompted by a desire to make yourself a strong candidate for reelection in 1940. Your motives would no longer be suspect, and the Nation would be willing to ascribe your efforts in the field of international affairs to statesmanship rather than showmanship.

As matters stand now, it is all too evident that a good deal of your program, no matter how nobly it may be prompted, is calculated to heighten your personal prestige rather than to solve international problems. A gesture toward the mediation of European crises would carry more weight both abroad and at home if it were known that you were not being guided by a desire to win another election. If all of our people were certain that you were seeking nothing personal, we should be far more solidly united in our efforts to solve impersonal problems impersonally.

Here is your opportunity to declare a real adjournment of politics, Mr. Roosevelt. The technique is simple. It requires no more than a brief sentence. The Nation is waiting for you to speak that sentence.

The Honor of Representing a Great District in the Congress of the United States

OF
HON. LOUIS LUDLOW
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I am immensely proud of the fact that I am privileged to represent a great district in the Congress of the United States, which to my mind is the premier law-making body in the world. There is no district in the United States that is more typically American, more genuinely and truly devoted to the home as the basis of society or more sincerely consecrated to our institutions of equality and freedom than the Twelfth Congressional District of Indiana, the capital district of our splendid Hoosier Commonwealth. Ours is an American district all the way through. It is free from the subversive influences which the Dies Committee has found to exist in so many other places. It has no glamorous ultra rich "four hundred." It is composed of good, honest-to-God people, the same warp and woof that brought about the birth of this Nation out of the travail of Old World oppression, and in the fullness of time made it great beyond comparison among the nations of the earth.

When our people elect a man to do a job they expect him to make the best use he can of the heart and brain that God gave him, to think the problem out as best he can, and then to act in accordance with the dictates of his judgment and his conscience in the light of the information his watchfulness and energy have enabled him to accumulate.

As I survey the recent neutrality fight retrospectively, I can truthfully say that, vital as was the issue involved, no one, either in Washington or at home, sought by undue pressures or influences to sway my judgment. It is a source of satisfaction to me to know that all seemed to give me credit for sincerity and to accept as a foregone conclusion that I would do what I thought was best for my district and my country, and that, Mr. Speaker, is what I did.

I may have been wrong—I hope I was wrong. I believed that repeal of the munitions embargo would expose us unnecessarily to entanglements and probably to ultimate involvement in the war. Now that Congress has acted, though I still fear the outcome, I hope and pray that we may escape being drawn in, and I pledge to our President my very best support in every effort he may make to keep America out of war.

Typical of other letters I received from home while the fight was on was one in verse which I appreciate so much that I am taking advantage of the unanimous consent of the House to insert it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The writer, Clarence C. Deupree, is an excellent businessman and a splendid citizen of Indianapolis. His poetic effusion, addressed to "My Dear Congressman and Friend," was as follows:

While folk may argue, con and pro,
Through the press, o'er 'phone or radio;
It seems to me, on facts at hand,
Constituents should not command
Their Senators and Congressmen
Just what to do—just how or when.

You men are there, with information
That can't be broadcast o'er our Nation,
And you want war no more than they—
Which is the reason why I say:
Use your judgment what best will be
The way to maintain our neutrality.

You may be wrong—you might be right;
If wrong, our sons may have to fight.
But being honest and sincere
Your judgment is better than ours out here,
And less confused than we who strive
To keep business and industry alive.

You're serving not some small group now—
You're serving a nation, and must somehow
Find courage, strength, and vision clear
To overcome selfishness and fear.
Our peace, our fate, rest in your hand;
Use your best judgment, is my command.

Recreational Aroostook

OF
HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

SPEECH OF HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER, OF MAINE

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech I delivered before the Rotary and Lions Clubs, of Fort Fairfield, and Frontier Fish and Game Club at the joint banquet Thursday evening, August 10, 1939:

Maine's two biggest crops have long been "taters" and tourists. Aroostook may easily and profitably excel in the second crop as well as the first.

Aroostook may well remember that 20 percent of the area of Maine is witnin Aroostook County. Less than one-third of this marvelously fertile area is required to produce nearly 20 percent of the potatoes in America.

The remaining two-thirds comprises over 4,000 square mile of forest and lakes and streams that might easily entertain 100,000 visitors for a 2 weeks' vacation each year. Ten million dollars would be distributed by these paying guests for the privilege of roaming over this imperial domain with no danger of crowding since a square mile of territory would be available for every pair of visitors.

Conserving and restoring our recreational resources in a great cooperative program is simply Yankee common sense. This program must be built on the fullest cooperation of all agencies concerned, public and private, State and Federal, but must be based primarily on the awakened interest of individual citizens who appreciate what this precious heritage means to the youth of the United States.

The Federal Bureau of Fisheries has shown the keenest understanding of what this greatest piece of unspoiled wilderness in the East may mean to millions of Americans within a day's travel. As a part now of the Interior Department the Bureau is associated with the greatest organized travel agency in the world as this department has been designated to introduce America and all its marvels not only to Americans but to world travelers from everywhere.

Among the trophies of the hunt in the Bath Club in London hangs one of the largest moose heads in the world taken in the woods of Maine.

Maine may well cultivate the most cordial relations with the Department of the Interior as we seek to develop both our commercial and sporting fisheries and as we seek to attract the 15,000,000 visitors that Hiram Ricker always claimed was easily the capacity of Maine.

OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

ADDRESS OF HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER, OF MAINE, AT MEETING OF BELFAST LIONS CLUB, MONDAY EVENING, AUGUST 14, 1939

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered at meeting of Belfast Lions Club, Monday evening, August 14, 1939:

The twinkling twenties have had their day. The terrible thirties are now nearly past. The forties lie before.

Soon we enter on a new decade. Soon we elect a President, mindful of the fact that the Presidents of the even decades have always faced terrific tasks.

One returns from Washington filled with confidence and hope. There is growing realization that America is not to be saved by law. More and more Members of the Congress are getting ready to let nature—or at any rate human nature—have a hand. People have an irresistible urge to get well, and this is true also of our economic problems.

After waiting a while for George or Franklin to do it, the average American finally decides to take hold for himself and see if the sorry mess in which we have been mired for a decade cannot be straightened out by the doctrine of self-help.

This tells the story of the America that is to be in this next decade. One needs not a gazing globe.

The travesty of want in the midst of plenty is coming to an end.

The potato growers of Aroostook are a classic example at this time. Special subsidies for cotton, wheat, and corn have left the farmers of the South and West with unparalleled surpluses and prices rapidly receding to record lows. These special aids were denied potato growers because the volume production of potatoes is confined to narrow areas.

Yet today the potato grower without these aids is infinitely better off than the cotton and wheat farmers of the South and West. Aroostook County and eastern Maine faces one of the most promising prospects in a decade for the prosperity of its major crop. Nature has smiled on Maine while withholding its blessing from many of our neighbors in the South and in the West. An increased crop in Maine this year finds the country with a steadily diminishing crop estimate elsewhere. This spells opportunity for Maine, but opportunity of which full advantage must be taken if Maine growers are to profit. America is getting ready once again to go ahead. The pessimists will be fooled who have sold America short and sailed off for foreign shores.

Neutrality

OF
HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, the peace and security of the citizens of the United States is assured as far as it is humanly possible for the Congress to do so by the passage of the new Neutrality Act. I supported it because it was my firm conviction that only the act of a madman can now draw us into this conflict.

The concessions this country makes in this law go far beyond any law ever placed on the statute books of our Nation. Search the history of this country, and nowhere will you find where we have ever denied the right of our ships and our citizens the freedom of the seas.

Under the terms of this law American ships cannot carry contraband to a neutral or belligerent port, and American citizens travel on their own responsibility if they enter the combat zone. That part of the law in itself should assure us peace with the world.

It was the destruction of our ships, with the consequent loss of American life that finally brought us into the World War in 1917, with the result that hundreds of thousands of our youth never returned, or became disabled for the rest of their lives. Until everyone who participated in that war and his or her dependents have gone to their reward the cost in dollars and cents will never be known. You know and I know no benefits accrued either to our Nation or its citizens as a result of our participation.

It was our duty to prevent a recurrence of what happened from 1914 to 1918; and although many disagree with my view, I think the passage of this act will accomplish it.

Another feature of the law worthy of special mention is that part which says to every person in this country, and that, of course, includes partnerships and corporations, you cannot extend credit to a belligerent. I know some claim this will soon mean credit and carry instead of cash and carry, but that change can only be made by Congress, and it is my opinion Congress will never make such a change. This is the first time in our history such a provision has been written into law.

We do not want the Government nor any agency of the Government or the citizens of this country to ever extend credit to a belligerent. If there is any one feature of the new law upon which the Congress is united it is this.

That this was not a partisan question is evidenced by the speech of one of the leading Republicans of the country, the gentleman from New York, Representative JAMES W. WADSWORTH, a former United States Senator from that State and one who has been prominently mentioned as the Republican candidate for President. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] in his speech, after showing the embargo had not accomplished what those originally advocating it thought it would accomplish, and who spoke against the embargo and voted against it when it was proposed several years ago, said in part Thursday:

> Under this legislation as now proposed in the cash-and-carry provision, overt acts cannot be committed against our ships, because our ships will not be permitted to carry anything to the belligerents in Europe. What overt acts, then, can be committed? I have heard it suggested that sabotage would be instigated here in the United States in the form of explosions and outrages of one sort and another, and that in the face of that possibility we would better pass a law which might keep us free from sabotage. Mr. Speaker, if we are ever to frame the foreign policy of the United States upon the theory that we cannot keep order in our own Government, in our own country, then, by heaven, we would better crawl into a hole and pull the hole in after us.
> It may be that madmen are loose in Europe; but as America stands today, in all her might and with all her potential power, I cannot conceive of any man so mad as to invite the United States to be his enemy. So I have never been panicky about our being drawn into this conflict, because I cannot conceive that any of the belligerents wants us to get in there and be its enemy. It would spell their ruin, and they all know it.

I want to say a word in reference to propaganda. You, Mr. Speaker, expressed my sentiments when in your speech of Thursday you said:

> Despite statutes, and despite proclamations, thank God we are still entitled to think at least as we please, although in some governments of the world men cannot act as they please under their systems of regimentation.

The right of the American people to think as they please, to petition their members of Congress and to express their views cannot and must never be denied. Regardless of whether letters and telegrams are inspired is beyond the point; I say no one should be criticised for free expression of their views, so long as they remain within the limits of the Constitution. I have no sympathy with those who would criticize. Whether expressions are in sympathy with my views or in contrast, I welcome them.

I have never attempted to misrepresent or mislead in order to accomplish an objective. The charge that the Members of the House were gagged is not supported by the facts. For 45 hours and 21 minutes the House of Representatives was in session before the resolution was messaged from the Senate. During that period four-fifths of the time was used to debate the question. Not once was a Member denied the right to speak and the House did not adjourn for the day until all who desired had been recognized. Millions of words were recorded on both sides of the question. Aside from this, day after day Members were permitted not only to place their own remarks in the RECORD but to include as part of their remarks the speeches of others, as well as newspaper articles and editorials in support of or in opposition to the pending question. So far as the leaders on both sides were concerned, politics were adjourned, and this likewise applied to almost every Member of the House. There were but few exceptions. When the resolution came from the Senate no attempt was made to fix debate. Finally, when it was evident that both those for and against had no additional speakers, a vote was taken. In my years of experience I have never seen a more liberal rule on a conference report. Under the regular rules of the House, a vote could have been forced after 1 hour's discussion, but no attempt was made to enforce the rule.

Mr. Speaker, only time will tell whether or not this new law will keep us out of war. Feeling that it will be more helpful than the 1937 law, I could do nothing and retain my self-respect but to vote for it.

SPEECH OF HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER, OF MAINE, AT THE WISCONSIN REPUBLICAN PICNIC AND FIELD DAY AT MILWAUKEE ON AUGUST 13, 1939

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech I delivered at the Wisconsin Republican picnic and field day at Milwaukee on August 13, 1939:

> The 1940 Republican is not a New Dealer. Neither is he an "old dealer." He believes in a square deal for everyone. That is the spirit that brought Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Michigan back into the Republican column in 1938. That is the spirit that will bring the United States back into the Republican column in 1940.
> Maine is happy and proud to have kept the faith. Maine and Vermont for some years have been the official spokesmen of 17,000,000 Americans. Now we welcome Wisconsin back into the great galaxy of States that subscribe still to the principles of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln.

The 1940 Republican is neither a radical nor a reactionary. In the past 2 decades each alike has had his opportunity and each has tried and failed.

No challenge is necessary of their sincerity of purpose in recognizing that the next decade belongs to the new spirit that is now abroad. America is once again on the march to the American way of life.

The world may well take notice of the American way during the next decade as we rededicate America to American ideals.

A square deal for everyone will spell peace, progress, and prosperity for America and for the world as well.

OF

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, October 31, 1939

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article prepared by me, on propaganda for war.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator BENNETT CLARK introduced the following resolution, which was never reported from the Foreign Affairs Committee:

"Resolved, That a special committee of seven Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation of the activities of any person, firm, or corporation acting for or on behalf of any foreign nation, by way of propaganda or otherwise, having as their ultimate goal or tending to cause, directly or indirectly, a change in the neutral position of the United States in the conflicts now being waged abroad. The committee shall report to the Senate the results of its study and investigations, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation.

"For the purpose of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Seventy-sixth and succeeding Congresses, to employ clerical and other assistance, to require by subpena, or otherwise, the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents; to make such investigations, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to incur such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $25,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee."

Foreign propaganda should be exposed, not after involvement but before. We waited 20 years for the exposure of the World War propaganda. The price of not knowing it was terrific. Let us not pay the terrible penalty again.

An English writer wrote, "Can we rope them in again?"

That very process is going on now, and will continue to be an important factor until the conclusion of the war.

I have heard Senators say that no one in the United States wants war. That is not a completely true statement of fact. There are persons in the country who desire our entrance into the war. I dare say most every Senator has received letters from individuals saying we should go into the war in order to destroy Germany. Public-opinion polls taken on a Nation-wide scale or those taken in separate communities show some persons want war. We are glad that the number is small, but around that nucleus may come more and more individuals who would want our country to go to war.

The French historian Hanataux described a conversation of Robert Bacon before the American entrance into the World War. This conversation was as follows:

"In America there are 50,000 people who understand the necessity of the United States entering the war immediately on your side. But there are 100,000,000 Americans who have not even thought of it. Our task is to see that the figures are reversed and that the 50,000 become the 100,000,000. We will accomplish this."

It is a known fact that the 50,000 had their number increased day by day until the United States went to war. It was not done overnight. It was a gradual process, in which propaganda played a tremendous part.

You may say that we have been assured by the President that there will be no war. May I quote President Wilson less than 3 months before the World War declaration? He said: "There will be no war. This country does not intend to become involved in this war. We are the only one of the great white nations that is free from war today, and it would be a crime against civilization for us to go in."

Yet we went in.

You may say that the people are aroused to the danger of war and that we won't participate. President Wilson, speaking in New York City in 1916, made this statement:

"I get a great many letters, my fellow citizens, from important and influential men in this country, but I get a great many other letters. I get letters from unknown men, from humble women, from people whose names have never been heard and will never be recorded, and there is but one prayer in all of these letters: 'Mr. President, do not allow anybody to persuade you that the people of this country want war with anybody.' "

Today the people are writing, saying: "Keep out of war." Will their voice be more emphatic and more influential than before?

A Canadian paper, the Windsor (Ontario) Daily Star, in its September 21, 1939, issue said:

"The arms-embargo clause of the Neutrality Act will be repealed for a starter, and the United States of America will be in the war along about the middle of next January."

Reports in Europe have sent back the news that many Europeans expect America to get into the conflict. Those of us who were in Europe before and after the declaration of war know that there is the general talk that the United States of America would become an ally. There seems to be a feeling that somewhere there has been an understanding.

Propaganda has to be successful before we enter the conflict.

President Roosevelt once gave us some good advice on this subject. It is important to watch those "small decisions." The President said:

"At this late date with the wisdom which is so easy after the event, we find it possible to trace the tragic series of small decisions which led Europe into the Great War in 1914 and eventually engulfed us and many other nations. We can keep out of war if those who watch and decide make certain that the small decisions of each day do not lead toward war, and if, at the same time, they possess the courage to say 'no' to those who selfishly or unwisely would let us go to war."

It is there the task lies. To make certain that those who watch and decide possess the courage to say "No" to those who selfishly or unwisely let us go to war.

But while we may be asleep, those who want us to go in are working to see that those who have the power of making those decisions say "yes" to the question. In 1914, 100,000,000 would have said "no" while 50,000 would have said "yes." In 1917 the final verdict was "yes."

The Montreal (Canada) Gazette for October 24 has an interesting article relating the story of a speech before the Canadian Club of Montreal. It follows:

[From the Gazette, Montreal, Canada, October 24, 1939]

"UNITED STATES HELD ANTINAZI BUT MORE ANTIWAR—WHITNEY H. SHEPARDSON SAYS 90 PERCENT OF AMERICANS OPPOSE PARTICIPATION—HE RIDICULES LINDBERGH—TELLS CANADIAN CLUB AVIATOR'S SPEECH WORSE THAN 'EVEN INSANE OR ILLITERATE' WOULD UTTER

"Ninety percent of the people of the United States, or more, are actively hostile to the reactionary philosophy, brutal methods, and Napoleonic ambitions of Adolph Hitler and his gangsters. Ninety percent of them hope that he and his outfit will be obliterated. They reckon there is an even chance that this will happen as a result of the war which he, and he alone, has started. Nevertheless, some 90 percent of them—not necessarily the same individuals—feel that the United States should not enter the war under present conditions; and popular polls indicate that 75 percent of them now believe—and I emphasize the word 'now'—that the United States should not enter the war even to save Great Britain and France from defeat.

"This statement was made before the Canadian Club of Montreal at its luncheon meeting yesterday in the Windsor Hotel by Whitney H. Shepardson, formerly assistant to the late Colonel House, and now vice president of International Railways of Central America, who was discussing some aspects of American foreign relations."

The important thing in that article is one little word. It has the same number of letters as the word "war"; that is, three. The word I refer to is "now." He said that the sentiment is against going to war now, and he desired to emphasize the word "now." I, likewise, want to emphasize it because it is in that situation we face the great danger. It is important we have the sentiment in America not alone now but always for our staying out of the wars in Europe.

Mr. Raymond Moley, former close associate and policy consultant of President Roosevelt, relates in his book, After Seven Years, how the process of education was going to be used. I refer to the following quotation from his book in which he discusses the aid to be given to England and France. The quotation follows:

"Observers recognized in these dramatic maneuverings signs of a State Department campaign to 'educate' the American people to the need for a 'stronger' foreign policy."

ROGERSON TELLS OF PRESENT-DAY PROPAGANDA

It is bad enough to be the victim of propaganda, but it is worse when we know how it is to be accomplished and yet be the sufferer. In a book entitled "Propaganda in the Next War," Sidney Rogerson tells how the English are going to use the technique of propaganda in the United States. This book was written and published in England as a part of a series edited by Capt. Liddell Hart entitled "The Next War." It was not written for American consumption.

In order that there will be a full understanding of the matter, I quote his writings:

There remains the United States—the great neutral. In the next war, as in the last, the result will probably depend upon the way in which the United States acts, and her attitude will reflect the reaction of her public to propaganda properly applied. During the Great War the efforts of the rival propagandists in the United States almost stagger belief. The Germans were the more amazing and their activities amounted to a degree of interference in American domestic affairs which will surely never be tolerated again. They entered the field of United States labor politics, organizing their own unions. They set up all sorts of propagandist bodies, whether supposedly pacifist organizations which adroitly blamed the Allies for keeping the war going or bureaus to work upon and inflame Negro opinion. They appealed to university-trained and professional men. They reached women by forming such bodies as the League of American Women for Strict Neutrality, and workingmen through Labor's National Peace Council. They even bought a New York daily paper. We were almost as thorough, though less blatant in our methods. Among our multifarious activities was the supply of a regular British news sheet to no fewer than 360 smaller American papers.

"For some time the issue as to which side the United States would take hung in the balance, and if the final result was a credit to our propaganda, we were helped by the carelessness of the Germans. They continually overreached themselves and, with all their native tendency to overorganization, forgot to cover up their tracks. Their propaganda was as obvious as it was energetic. I repeat, it is unthinkable that such a dog fight between non-Americans will again be permitted in the United States. The American peoples have progressed a long way since those days, when foreign politics were hardly touched upon in any but a few of the greater newspapers. Nowadays the American foreign correspondent is one of the most resourceful and best informed in the world. They have what amounts almost to a passion for "debunking" foreign aims and ideas, but while they have encouraged Americans to interest themselves in politics overseas, they have not yet succeeded in transferring their own objective outlook to their readers. Excellently served though the Americans are by their news gatherers and reporters abroad, they can perhaps hardly be expected, in the security of their own detached hemisphere, to see European affairs realistically. For one thing the American is the great champion of the oppressed—and frequently of the soi-disant oppressed—which may explain why he is so frequently taken in by the hard-luck story of London confidence tricksters. Secondly, the American peoples are still under the influence of much of the Great War propaganda. They are more susceptible than most peoples to mass suggestion—they have been brought up on it—and since 1918 they have shut themselves off from reality. Thirdly, they are at this moment the battleground of an active propaganda of labels.

"There is no sense in refusing to recognize that there has always been a substratum of suspicion of Great Britain in the United States. The American people may admire some of our traits and hold others in contempt, but they periodically tend to suspect our motives. During the Great War we were particularly vulnerable to indirect propaganda in the United States, and the Germans were able to work up a fierce feeling for the miserable Irish, struggling to get home rule; for the oppressed Indians, writhing under a British military despotism; for the fleasome fellaheen in Egypt, kept on the bare subsistence line; and for the poor Jew whose brethren were periodically beaten up or burned by Britain's Allies. It is good to feel that in the next war those horses will not run; certainly not in the same colors. The bestowal of more than dominion status on Ireland, the Indian constitution, and the recognition of the Kingdom of Egypt have removed these dangerous centers of propaganda infection. Whatever, if anything, we may have lost by these concessions, they have made us so much the less vulnerable to enemy propaganda attack in America. It will be difficult again to rally American feeling against us on these counts. There remain the Jews. It has been estimated that of the world Jew population of approximately 15,000,000, no fewer than 5,000,000 are in the United States. Twenty-five percent of the inhabitants of New York are Jews. During the Great War we bought off this huge American Jewish public by the promise of the Jewish national home in Palestine, held by Ludendorff to be the master stroke of allied propaganda, as it enabled us not only to appeal to Jews in America but to Jews in Germany as well. Since then our attempts to implement our undertaking have landed us in difficulties with the indigenous Arabs, agitated by Italian propaganda, without satisfying the Jews. We have not satisfied the educated British Jews. How much less have we satisfied the more remote Jew community on the other side of the Atlantic? In addition, the recent realist policy of the British Government has been worked up into a propaganda of significant extent and intensity which represents Great Britain as being 'half Fascist'—excuse the label—all ready and prepared to 'sell the democratic pass' and go 'all Fascist' at the first convenient opportunity. This is being developed by the intense Jewish hatred of Germany and from her of all dictator countries, and backed by the influence of the Catholic Church and undenominational liberals.

"At the moment we have a strong section of American opinion against us, but if war were to break out tomorrow between England and Germany this mass of opinion would have to come down on one side or the other and it will be marvelous indeed if German propaganda could succeed in bringing it down on theirs.

"In general the situation in the United States is more favorable to Great Britain than in 1914, in that the obvious centers of infection have been removed; but less favorable in that we have temporarily at any rate lost caste as a "democratic" state because of the propaganda which represents us as truckling to, or at least having truck with "dictators." Though we are not unfavorably placed, we shall require to do much propaganda to keep the United States benevolently neutral. To persuade her to take our part will be much more difficult, so difficult as to be unlikely to succeed. It will need a definite threat to America, a threat, moreover, which will have to be brought home by propaganda to every citizen, before the Republic will again take arms in an external quarrel. The position will naturally be considerably eased if Japan were involved, and this might and probably would bring America in without further ado. At any rate, it would be a natural and obvious object of our propagandists to achieve this, just as during the Great War they succeeded in embroiling the United States with Germany.

"Fortunately, with America our propaganda is on firm ground. We can be entirely sincere, as our main plank will be the old democratic one. We must clearly enunciate our belief in the democratic form of government and our firm resolve to adhere to it.

"Our minor propaganda will aim at attaching the support of important sections, such as the Jews, probably by the declaration of a clear-cut policy on Palestine and of our intention if victorious to put an end to anti-Semitic persecution, and of the Roman Catholic community in similar terms. These should not be difficult to pursue, nor to put over to the American public.

"We shall as before send over our leading literary lights and other men with names well known in the United States to put our point of view over the dinner table. Our trouble here will be to find men with equally commanding reputations to step into the shoes of such as Kipling, Barrie, Shaw, Galsworthy, and Wells. Conversely, we should exploit to the full the views and experiences of American nationals who might be serving in our forces or those of our Allies. We should make much of them, decorate them, signal them out for mention in dispatches and in the press and use their stories as propaganda material to their own people. This was a form of propaganda very ably developed by the French during the Great War. American newspapermen in London are of approved mettle and, though impervious to any obvious propaganda, should nevertheless represent a valuable propaganda force on the strength of the day-to-day news they send over, quite apart from the fact that many of them like this country. In an experience of knowing many of them over a period of 18 years I can echo Admiral Brownrigg's words praising 'their absolute reliability, their honesty in preserving secret information which I had been compelled or perhaps had thought wise to impart to them, and their loyalty in never making use of it until I give them the word "go."'

"We shall see that they are given every facility for observing and reporting and that their messages are censored sympathetically. Similarly with their news-reel men. They should be the first to be allowed to 'shoot' pictures of air raids in order that a proper volume of pictorial 'horror' will be available in one of the few great countries where 'atrocity propaganda' will still be operative.

"Our cables and wireless telegraph services will be available for less urgent or secret messages. Our radio propaganda should also be working at full pressure, but there must be a great improvement upon the present lackadaisical outlook. I can best illustrate this by the following personal experience. On the evening that the world was standing expectantly to hear the Prime Minister's pronouncement on Great Britain's attitude if the Germans followed their coup against Austria by one against Czechoslovakia, I ran into a friend who is possibly our best-known radio commentator. 'Tell me what I'm going to tell America,' he asked me. 'I've got to do my weekly talk on British affairs over the American "network" in half an hour and I haven't made up my mind what I ought to say.' 'But surely you're in touch with the Government,' I replied. 'Haven't they given you a line, knowing that you regularly reach hundreds of thousands of American listeners?' 'Not a word,' was his surprising answer. 'I'm not in touch with any governmental source of information. They have never tried to get in touch with me, though someone must know what I'm doing. Still I've tried to get in touch with them.' And he explained how he had previously been down to a certain Government department where he was permitted to see a junior member of the press office who could not be of any real service to him. This is a sober fact, and illustrates as well as may be how much our authorities are doing to counteract the anti-British radio propaganda which is growing in the United States.

"I must not, however, give the impression that we are doing absolutely nothing at present to direct propaganda toward foreign countries. That would be unfair to that esoteric body, the British Council, which occupies itself in what it calls 'cultural propaganda,' or more succinctly, in spreading a 'knowledge and appreciation of our language, literature, art, science, and education.' It has numerous committees composed of politicians, civil servants, manufacturers and merchants, and educationists, and sends out British lecturers and musicians, gramophone records, periodicals, and literature to various foreign countries, entertains editors and educationists visiting England, and generally encourages the young idea, whether in Latvia or Uruguay, to learn and appreciate the English language. Although it has practically no permanent staff, it claims to discharge the onerous duties of coordinating the propaganda activities of other bodies, excellent in their own spheres, like the travel association (the old 'Come to Britain' organization) and the film institute (a body which exists primarily to foster the educational and documentary film), and of linking these up with the British Broadcasting Co.'s vague operations.

"Much of the council's work is no doubt excellent in its way, but it is emphatically not propaganda. In the present situation it is rather like trying to interest a working-class mother in fancy needlework when other energetic people are instructing her how to make her family budget go further. Cultural propaganda is a dilettante vision. It advances nothing constructive and, despite its hosts of committees, it is not unified. Moreover, it is not controlled either by experts or a permanent staff, but by a collection of enthusiastically minded amateurs. The worst that can be said about it is that it spends thousands of pounds of public money which might be more profitably applied; the best is that it can do no harm and may even wring a tear out of some aged native of Bulgaria or Peru who can recall the days before Great Britain thought it necessary artificially to stimulate an interest in her national culture. Also, it may provide a skeleton which strengthened in the caliber as well as the numbers of its personnel and animated by a propaganda spirit, might be padded out as part of the ministry of propaganda in a future war."

As Rogerson stated:

"We shall, as before, send over our leading literary lights and other men with names well known in the United States to put our point of view over the dinner table."

Many instances of this could be shown but two news reports show the parade. They follow:

"ONE THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FIVE ARRIVE HERE ON THE 'WASHINGTON'—LINER DELAYED AT LE VERDON AND SOUTHAMPTON—MEETS STORMS ON CROSSING—BRINGS FIFTY-FOUR BLOODED DOGS—LORD MARLEY, A PASSENGER, SEES LONG WAR, WITH THE ALLIES FINALLY 'BREAKING GERMANY'

"The United States liner Washington, with 1,535 passengers from Southampton and Le Verdon arrived here yesterday after a prolonged voyage caused by delays in both ports. In addition to a number of notables, the vessel carried a large cargo of Bordeaux wines and French cheeses, and 54 dogs, including several champions shipped here from England to prevent their possible destruction in the war.

"One passenger was Lord Marley, deputy speaker of the British House of Lords, who is here to fulfill a lecture engagement arranged several months ago. He predicted a long war, but one that eventually would "break Germany.' The present conflict he described as 'a war of machines—not men,' and said that Britain would settle only for 'a peace with honor.' "

"DUFF COOPER SEES REVOLT ENDING WAR—EX-LORD OF BRITISH ADMIRALTY, HERE, PREDICTS CONSERVATIVE INSURRECTION IN REICH—HOLDS MONARCHY LIKELY—OTTO VON HAPSBURG MAY RULE, HE SAYS UPON ARRIVAL ON THE 'MANHATTAN' TO LECTURE—ASTONISHED AT SUBMARINE FEAT

"He was accompanied by his wife, the former Lady Diana Manners, who, as an actress, played the virgin in 'The Miracle.' They will stay at the Hotel Ambassador and will go to the west coast before beginning their tour. He will speak here on 'The Survival of Liberty' and 'The World We Live In.'

"S. K. Ratcliffe, British writer and lecturer, another passenger, said that fear of public opinion was dominating the strategy of all commands. 'All governments are afraid of launching a great air war,' he said. 'They can't see what it will lead to and neither side wants the responsibility for starting it.'

"Besides Mr. Duff Cooper and Mrs. Ratcliffe, there were four other visiting British lecturers aboard the Manhattan. The others were Cecil Roberts, former war correspondent and novelist; I. O. Richards, lecturer at Cambridge University; R. Ellis Roberts, journalist and author; and Miss Phyllis Bottome, novelist.

"NOT SENT BY GOVERNMENT

"All refused to discuss what course the United States should take in regard to the war. They had agreed in advance among themselves not to do so, as a course of conduct out of place for a visiting alien. Mr. Ratcliffe, who will lecture on 'Why Britain Went to War,' said that while most of them would discuss war issues, none had been sent by the British Government. 'The British Government isn't sending any speakers,' he added. 'They are all coming on their own steam.' "

Do you doubt that Mr. Ratcliffe will tell Why Britain Went to War is because of their desire to preserve democracy? Do you doubt that Mr. Ratcliffe will not compare the English and American people so that their interest will be our interest; Do you doubt Mr. Ratcliffe will create the impression that United States will be invaded if England loses? Do you doubt that Mr. Ratcliffe hopes we will go to war for the same reasons he will say England went to war?

But how careful they will be?

Lord Lothian, the British Ambassador now in Washington, wrote in the London Observer as follows:

"If American sentiment became persuaded that the United States was being maneuvered into commitment to war by foreign intrigue, or for reasons of politics or finance, it might swing back violently to the ultraisolationism of the Ludlow amendment requiring a referendum before the United States entered a war."

Speaking of the significance of the British influence, the magazine News Week says:

"But if Lothian's strategy is sound as well as subtle, the same guaranty cannot be given for all the British and French spokesmen now in this country or on the way. Among these may be listed Lord Marley, Deputy Speaker of the House of Lords; Vladimir Poliakoff, famous as the 'Augur' of the London Times and the New York Times; Alfred Duff-Cooper, former First Lord of the Admiralty; and a perfect Franco-British team calculated to win the movie fans' vote—Charles Boyer and his English wife, Pat Paterson, both cinema actors.

"The greatest propaganda potential lies with those Americans who already are committed to the Anglo-French point of view. Already these people are busy in Washington, New York, and many other cities, pointing out that security for this country entails seeing to it that the Allies win—whatever that might ultimately involve. And among their number Lothian himself lists the President of the United States."

"IF JAPAN WERE INVOLVED

Rogerson states:

"The position will naturally be considerably eased if Japan were involved and this might and probably would bring America in without further ado. At any rate, it would be a natural and obvious object of our propagandists to achieve this, just as during the Great War they succeeded in embroiling the United States with Germany."

Let us pick up the recent newspapers and note the great increase of interest in Japan. For weeks the news from the Far East was placed in the want-ad page. Now take a look. Here are front-page headlines from the New York Times:

Japan defies the United States to curb China war—Civilians in Tokyo hail United States warning; military angered—Tokyo seeks talks with Grew on rift—Japanese declare peace asked by United States in East impossible—United States warns Japan of economic pressure if she persists on her course in China.

This story from the New York Times of October 20, 1939, is the background:

"WARNING BY GREW JARS THE JAPANESE—INTIMATION OF UNITED STATES MOVE OR CHECK TO TOKYO MILITARISTS SEEN IN REMARKS ON CHINA

"TOKYO, Friday, October 20.—Official and diplomatic circles were rocked today by the speech of United States Ambassador Joseph C. Grew, in which he asserted frankly that American opinion deeply resented the 'bombings, indignities, and manifold interference with American rights' in China at the hands of the Japanese Army.

"Japanese and foreign observers who said they were 'astounded' at the outspoken address, one of the strongest ever made by a diplomat in Japan, expressed the belief that it had two possible meanings:

"1. That the United States was preparing definite action to oppose further Japanese 'interference' in China.

"2. A strong indication that public opinion in Japan itself had turned against Japanese militarists.

" 'The ground in Japan must have been prepared in advance for such a powerful statement,' well-informed sources said. 'A year ago it would have done more harm than good, therefore it would not have been made.'

"Ambassador Grew, who said his words came 'straight from the horse's mouth,' spoke yesterday before an audience of Japanese notables at a luncheon of the American-Japan Society, often a sounding board for authoritative discussion of American-Japanese relations."

Of this I shall make no comment.

"SAVE DEMOCRACY

Rogerson stated in his work: "Fortunately with America, our propaganda is on firm ground. We can be entirely sincere, as our main plank will be the old democratic one."

We are flooded with this type of propaganda. A great amount is coming from Americans. Even high Government officials are active in spreading it. They call the war "our war" and speak of the Allies fighting "our fight." They speak of the war as another war "to save democracy."

As I have said, propaganda is not labeled such. Sometimes the best propaganda is that that accomplishes two or more purposes. For instance, the exhibits in the British building at the World's Fair. The Magna Carta, a great document, drew—and should have drawn—much attention. It coupled in the minds of many England and liberty. This is a very valuable impression to have created at this time. Also at the exhibit there was found the lineage of George Washington, and how he was related to the English rulers. This was to create the good-will type of propaganda.

Remember the visit of the King and Queen? Remember the pictures and statements about how democratic they were?

One Washington paper headlines the visit to the Capitol by the King and Queen with this line:

"Standing on floor stained by burning of 1814, English rulers retake Capitol by charm."

A Congressman told the King that his State had never been at war with England; to which the King replied, "Fine."

The United Press on June 8 comments about the visit:

"BRITAIN HOPES VISIT WILL WIN BACK UNITED STATES SUPPORT

"Behind the pomp and glitter of British majesty's first visit to the United States diplomats saw today the prospect of a new era in Anglo-American relationship, with possible far-reaching effects upon a war-clouded world.

"High diplomatic stakes are involved for both nations.

"For Britain there lies the hope that the visit of the King and Queen will win for modern England—beset on every side with threats to its traditional power and prestige—both moral and material sympathies of the Nation which threw off British rule a century and a half ago.

"For the United States there is the hope that friendly feeling engendered by the visit might win closer allegiance by Britain to those policies which America believes necessary if the world is not again to be plunged into general conflict.

"Veteran internationalists see in the occasion a friendly personal gesture by the British rulers to recapture for Great Britain the interest and cooperation of this country lost by past blunders of British statescraft.

"Constitutional limitations surrounding the British throne prevent the occasion from being more than a friendly gesture. The British King is prohibited by law from personal diplomatic activity.

"Both the American and British Governments hope, however, that the brief visit will make possible closer relations generally between both Governments and peoples.

"It marks an effort by the British, with the benevolent consent of the American Government, to bring closer together the parallels which the two Governments have followed in foreign policies.

"Most diplomats agree that it is the British policies which have wavered and which must now come closer to the parallel of American policy."

Anthony Eden, who was given quite a fanfare of publicity when he came to the United States, told Parliament:

"We are constantly and daily in close consultation with the Government of the United States. Over and over again we have taken either parallel or similar action, and that in itself is an indication of the closeness of such collaboration."

It will be recalled in his speech in New York (placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 4, 1939, by Senator PITTMAN) that his main thesis was that spoken of by Rogerson as "the old democratic plank."

How shall the British propaganda be used in motion pictures? Rogerson states: "Similarly with the news-reel men. They should be the first to be allowed to 'shoot' pictures of air raids, in order that a proper volume of pictorial 'horror' will be available in one of the few great countries where 'atrocity propaganda' will still be operative."

If you doubt the English are allowing these news reels to be sent to America with their official approval, just stop by the movie house a couple of times and see the scenes of bombing.

Why the great number of films aimed at generating hate?

Why the increase of films aimed at arousing our sentiments to take sides?

One of the best ways to locate the 1939 propaganda efforts is to look how the propaganda was used before the last World War. There are a number of excellent books and articles on this subject. I shall quote from some of these.

Fredrick Lumley, in his book The Propaganda Menace, deals with use of atrocity propaganda and how it was used in 1914–18. The part referring to the "house of propaganda" is very interesting. Under the heading "The appeal to fear," he says:

"THE APPEAL TO FEAR

"One of the most successful ways of making people afraid is to overwhelm them with atrocity stories, the while they are quietly informed that their confidence and affection have been misplaced. The Americans were certainly flooded with atrocity stories. A book by a French chief editor gives us some light on the origin of these stories. The house of propaganda and prostitution in Paris is described. 'Its principal work consisted in making photographs and cuts of wooden figures with cut-off hands, torn-out tongues, gouged-out eyes, crushed skulls, and brains laid bare. The pictures thus made were sent as unassailable evidence of German atrocities to all parts of the globe, where they did not fail to produce the desired effect. In the same rooms fictitious photographs were made of bombarded French and Belgian churches, violated graves and monuments, and scenes of ruins and desolation. The staging and painting of those scenes were done by the best scene painters of the Paris grand opera.'

" 'During the late war,' says Lasswell, 'innumerable schemes for the classifying of enemy outrages were invented. As a random sample one may select the first large and important atrocity brochure put out by the French Government. German sins were sorted into bins which were labeled thus:

" '1. Violation of the neutrality of Luxemburg and Belgium.

" '2. Violation of French frontier before declaration of war.

" '3. Killing of prisoners and wounded.

" '4. Looting, arson, rape, murder.

" '5. Use of forbidden bullets.

" '6. Use of burning liquids and asphyxiating gas.

" '7. Bombarding of fortresses without notice and of unfortified towns; the destruction of buildings consecrated to religion, art, science, and charity.

" '8. Treacherous methods of warfare.

" '9. Cruelties inflicted on civil population.'

"This fare was concocted and intended primarily for home (French) consumption. It was issued to awaken the French people and frighten them into maddened action against the Germans. It was designed to make them over into not only willing but eager tools of the government and the military. And there can be no doubt of its effects.

"But, since France needed help from outside, these atrocity stories were eagerly and generously put into the hands of the Allies and neutrals to show them plainly what was in store for them if Germany were allowed to win. This stuff was designed to convert opponents and sway neutrals, to make the people who might be gathered against Germany afraid—afraid of inaction, afraid of any other ending of the war than a crushing victory over Germany.

"The quantitative methods of modern social science were applied to the atrocity problem as the war went on. In a report prepared for the Serbs about Austro-Hungarian atrocities the first plate, which summarizes the investigation is entitled 'Statistics of Atrocities.' It is limited to the districts of Potzerie, Matchva, Yadar, and certain others. Women and children are recorded in parallel columns, and the number of cases relating to each item is recorded. The items are:

" 'Executed or otherwise shot, bayoneted or knifed, throats cut, killed, burned alive, killed in massacre, beaten to death with rifles or sticks, stoned to death, hanged, disembowelled, bound and tortured on the spot, missing, carried off as prisoners, wounded, arms cut off or broken, legs cut off or broken, noses cut off, ears cut off, eyes gouged out, sexual parts mutilated, skin torn in strips, flesh or scalp removed, corpses cut into small pieces, breasts cut off, women violated.'

"Certain special items, such as the use of explosive bullets, which were not susceptible to statistical treatment, were dealt with in qualitative terms. To the impact of the quantitative method is added the dramatization of the individual case. The book is copiously embellished with horror photographs of mutilated corpses and devastated villages.

"For the awakening of their own population the Germans drew up a long list of Allied sins. For the further stiffening of the nationalist backbone against the English the Indian National Congress published a long report on the Peshawar affair of 1930, and this report contains the inevitable atrocity stories and pictures.

"Says Lasswell: 'The cult of satanism thus arises and feeds on hate, Vengeance is Mine, saith the Lord, and the Lord is working through us to destroy the Devil. The stirring stanzas of Lissauer's famous Hymn of Hate expose this in its pristine nudity:

" 'Hate by water and hate by land;
Hate of the heart and hate of the hand;
We love as one, we hate as one;
We have but one foe alone—England.'

"And so citizens were made afraid; they were terrorized; in all countries they were frightened into feverish activity and every needed sacrifice. The methods were everywhere the same; to some extent the content was the same. But the differences in the propaganda of the several countries or the two sets of opposing forces gather mainly about the content."

AUTHORITIES TELL HOW PROPAGANDA WAS USED IN 1914–17

Sir Gilbert Parker, who was in charge of the English propaganda before and during the World War, wrote in Harpers:

"Perhaps here I may be permitted to say a few words concerning my own work, since the beginning of the war. It is in a way a story by itself, but I feel justified in writing one or two paragraphs about it. Practically since the day war broke out between England and the Central Powers I became responsible for American publicity. I need hardly say that the scope of my department was very extensive and its activities widely ranged. Among the activities was a weekly report to the British Cabinet on the state of American opinion, and constant touch with the permanent correspondents of American newspapers in England. I also frequently arranged for important public men in England to act for us by interviews in American newspapers; and among these distinguished people were Mr. Lloyd George, the present Prime Minister, Viscount Grey, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Bonar Law, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Sir Edward Carson, Lord Robert Cecil, Mr. Walter Runciman, the lord chancellor, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, Lord Cromer, Will Crooks, Lord Curzon, Lord Gladstone, Lord Haldane, Mr. Henry James, Mr. John Redmond, Mr. Selfridge, Mr. Zangwill, Mrs. Humphry Ward, and fully a hundred others.

"Among other things, we supplied 360 newspapers in the smaller States of the United States with an English newspaper, which gives a weekly review and comment of the affairs of the war. We established connection with the man in the street through cinema pictures of the Army and Navy, as well as through interviews, articles, pamphlets, etc.; and by letters in reply to individual American critics, which were printed in the chief newspapers of the State in which they lived, and were copied in newspapers of other and neighboring States. We advised and stimulated many people to write articles; we utilized the friendly services and assistance of confidential friends; we had reports from important Americans constantly, and established association, by personal correspondence, with influential and eminent people of every profession in the United States, beginning with university and college presidents, professors and scientific men, and running through all the ranges of the population. We asked our friends and correspondents to arrange for speeches, debates, and lectures by American citizens, but we did not encourage Britishers to go to America and preach the doctrine of entrance into the war. Besides an immense private correspondence with individuals, we had our documents and literature sent to great numbers of public libraries, Y. M. C. A. societies, universities, colleges, historical societies, clubs, and newspapers.

"It is hardly necessary to say that the work was one of extreme difficulty and delicacy, but I was fortunate in having a wide acquaintance in the United States and in knowing that a great many people had read my books and were not prejudiced against me. I believe that the American people could not be driven, preached to, or shoved into the war, and that when they did enter it would be the result of their own judgment and not the result of exhortation, eloquence, or fanatical pressure of Britishers."

To amplify the statement of Sir Gilbert Parker, the following quotation from British Propaganda at Home and in the United States, by James Duane Squires, is interesting:

"According to David Lloyd George, almost the first thing that Parker did after assuming his new duties was to make a careful analysis of American press opinion on the war, following that with an equally thorough investigation into American opinion in the colleges and universities. From other sources we know that on the basis of these investigations and on a careful reading of the American Who's Who a mailing list was prepared. It was this mailing list containing thousands of names which was the basis for the distribution of Wellington House propaganda in the United States. The list was complete about the middle of December 1914, and mailing operations began immediately.

"To the persons on this mailing list, and to others whose names were subsequently added, there was sent the propaganda literature which the men in Wellington House believed would be most useful. Sometimes the books and pamphlets had enclosed with them suave and skillfully phrased letters. The enclosure cards which came with the books carried only Sir Gilbert's name and address, never any mention of Wellington House. The whole appearance was that of a kindly, friendly Englishman, who more or less was doing only his simple duty by his many American friends in sending them this literature, and inviting their observations on it or on the war in general. Sometimes, to vary the thing, the enclosure cards apparently came from the authors of the books and pamphlets, especially when the authors were well-known men like J. W. Headlam, Viscount Bryce, or John Buchan. But this was generally a ruse de guerre. They usually came from the same place—Wellington House.

"Twice, at least, prior to 1918 Sir Gilbert alluded to his work in an indirect way. In April 1915 he declared in a public address:

" 'I have watched American opinion; I have read scores of American newspapers steadily; I have received vast numbers of letters from prominent Americans of all professions and positions in the United States since this war began * * *.'

"If people perhaps wondered then why Parker's correspondence should have been vast, there is no need to wonder at it now. With most of the American Who's Who among his correspondents it is hardly surprising that he had an immense amount of mail. A few weeks later he wrote in similar vein:

" 'Since the beginning of the war I have had a very large correspondence with American citizens and have watched closely the trend of opinion in the United States through a great number of newspapers which come to me regularly. The United States being the most important of all the neutral nations, and with a scheme of government and with ambitions for civilization differing only in color and detail from our own, its opinion and judgment are of deep importance to all other nations engaged in the war.'

Of this list, the Times History of the War, XXI, says:

"The Wellington House mailing list contained over '200,000 names of influential people throughout the Union.' This seems much exaggerated; in any event, not every pamphlet was sent to every person. An examination of some of the early pamphlets sent over by Parker will disclose at the bottom of the first page certain figures which are presumably printers' directions; e. g., on Julian Corbett's pamphlet, The Spectre of Navalism (London, 1915), these figures appear: "Wt. 6907—G 4619. 13,500,6/15 D&S." The present writer would translate this as follows: Wellington House pamphlet with its file numbers, published in June 1915, in a quantity of 13,500, by Darling & Son, printers. If this surmise is correct, then the number distributed of that particular document is obviously much less than the figure given by the Times History. After 1915 these figures are no longer printed in the pamphlets, and therefore no estimate can be made of their circulation."

Prof. H. C. Peterson, of the University of Oklahoma, in his excellent book, Propaganda for War, gives the following information as to the use of propaganda:

"PROPAGANDA 'IN AMERICAN CLASSROOMS AND PULPITS, FACTORIES, AND OFFICES'

"The British campaign to induce the United States to come to their assistance affected every phase of American life; it was propaganda in its broadest meaning. News, money, and political pressure each played its part and the battle itself was fought not only in London, New York, and Washington, D. C., but also in American classrooms and pulpits, factories, and offices. It was a campaign to create a pro-British attitude of mind among Americans, to get American sympathies and interests so deeply involved in the European war that it would be impossible for this country to remain neutral.

"The first problem confronting the directors of any such campaign was that of winning the sympathy of the general public. When Lord Northcliffe visited this country he remarked of Americans: 'They dress alike, they talk alike, they think alike. What sheep.' Although he was not entirely correct, he was right in that the American public, like any public, demands uniformity of thought and conformity of action. Insofar as Americans were sheep, they had to be reached through their emotions. Although every public thinks with its hopes, its fears, and its affections, the pre-war American public was especially sentimental, excessively turbulent in comparison with European, and, finally, was subject to waves of emotion, apathy, interest, and boredom. The work of the British propagandist was to harness these feelings and put them to work for the Allies.

"USE OF WHO'S WHO FOR PROPAGANDA PURPOSES

"In September 1914 Charles Masterman was authorized by the British Foreign Office to form a war-propaganda bureau. Installed in Wellington House, the office of an insurance firm, it began to issue the propoganda which was soon to flood the United States. Developing by leaps and bounds, it became the principal outlet for books, pamphlets, and other instruments of British propaganda. Each branch of the work was controlled by a separate department under the direction of some individual of considerable prominence. Mr. Eric Maclagan was in charge of propaganda for France; Mr. William Archer directed the department for the Scandinavian countries; while Sir Gilbert Parker supervised the one which took care of propaganda for the United States—the American ministry of informatian. Parker had as his assistants Prof. Macneile Dixon, of Glasgow University; Mr. A. J. Toynbee, of Balliol College; and others. Starting out with 9 men, by 1917 he had 54.

" 'The mailing list of Wellington House (as a whole) being carefully compiled was expanded till it contained 260,000 names of influential persons throughout the Union.' Sir Gilbert Parker's list was made after consulting the American Who's Who. From this compilation he made separate groupings of prominent Americans, according to their profession, supposed intelligence, or standing in the community.

"Nicholson has stated that 'Wellington House was * * * concerned with the production, translation, and distribution of books, pamphlets, Government publications, speeches, etc., dealing with the war, its origin, its history, and all the varied and difficult questions which arose during its development; the production and distribution of special pictorial papers; assisting in the placing of articles and interviews designed to influence opinion in the world's newspapers and magazines, especially in America; the wide distribution of pictorial matter, cartoons, pictures, and drawings, photographs for insertion in newspapers and periodicals and for exhibition; the production and distribution of cinematograph films; personal correspondence with influential people abroad, especially in America; arrangements for the interchange of visits, of personal tours to neutral and allied countries, and of visits of distinguished neutrals and of representatives of the Allies to this country; the production and distribution of maps, diagrams, posters, lantern slides, and lectures, pictures, post cards, and all other possible means of miscellaneous propaganda.'

"Sir Gilbert Parker has remarked that 'besides our private correspondence with individuals we had our literature sent to a great number of public libraries, Y. M. C. A. societies, universities, colleges, clubs, and newspapers.'

"Among the authors who wrote for Wellington House were many distinguished people, such as James M. Beck, William Archer, James Bryce, G. K. Chesterton, Conan Doyle, Sir Edward Cook, J. W. Headlan, Cardinal Mercier, E. J. Trevelyan, A. Maurice Low, Mrs. Humphrey Ward, Alfred Noyes, Hilaire Belloc, and J. M. Robertson. The naval censor tells of calling on Joseph Conrad, Rudyard Kipling, Alfred Noyes, and many others to popularize the British cause, and in one way or another they all responded.

"KEEP OPERATIONS SECRET

"The operations of Wellington House were kept amazingly secret from Englishmen as well as Americans. When the Prime Minister was asked about the activities of Mr. Masterman, he replied that the latter was 'continuing certain work which he was requested by the Government to undertake at the beginning of the war. The work is of a highly confidential nature, and much of its efficiency depends upon its being conducted in secret * * *.' Even many officials in the English Government did not realize that there was such a thing as British propaganda.

"Although most of the formal propaganda came from Wellington House, there was a large amount produced by scores of unofficial or voluntary groups and organizations. One list of them is as follows: (1) The faculty of the Oxford University issued the Oxford pamphlets 'often distinguished by authentic information.' In 'the majority of cases the authors were able to give a patriotic bias to the apparently objective presentation of material; (2) the Parliamentary Recruiting Committee; (3) the Cobden Club; (4) a nameless group of Anglican clerics; (5) the Council of Loyal British Subjects of British, Austrian, or Hungarian Birth; (6) the United Workers; (7) the Atlantic Union; (8) the Victoria League; (9) the Union of Democratic Control; (10) the Central Committee for National Patriotic Organizations.'

"This last organization was a good example of the volunteer propagand groups. It was located at 8 Carlton House Terrace, London, and was established by G. W. Prothero and Harry Curl. It started work in August 1914, was formally organized November 21, 1914, and soon had voluntary local organizations in England with subcommittees to take care of propaganda in other parts of the British Empire and throughout the world. Its report states: 'The supply of literature and information to the United States of America was early in the war transferred, for special and imperative reasons, to a separate committee.' It had affiliated societies in all neutral countries. In the words of their report, 'other channels * * * have been the numberless national and international societies, associations, leagues, unions, and alliances * * * public reading rooms, social clubs, workingmen's clubs, officers' messes, seamen's institutes, hotels, and casinos.' British chambers of commerce were used as distributing centers.

"PROPAGANDA IN SCHOOLS

"Students from neutral countries and British nationals abroad were exploited in the same manner. They had 250 speakers who had by 1916 conducted 15,000 meetings. They distributed 850,000 leaflets to school children and 900,000 to industrial districts through libraries. They sent 250,000 pamphlets, booklets, and other publications to the neutral world.

"Perhaps the most interesting procedure of this particular organization was its system of exploiting the friendships and business connections of leading Britishers. It obtained lists of important Americans who had dealings with people in England and sent propoganda to them. The Americans naturally thought the material was from their friends in England. The committee's report states that by 'this means very many important communities—philosophical, educational, religious, scientific, philanthropic, artistic, legal, medical, commercial, industrial, mining, agricultural, engineering, banking, athletic, etc.—have been reached.'

"USING AMERICANS TO CHECK VALUE AND EFFECTIVENESS OF PROPAGANDA

"A vital part of the British propaganda organization was its information service. The traditional information agents, ambassadors, and consuls, naturally sent in regular reports. In addition the Morgan firm kept British officials informed as to conditions in the United States. At one time the British Chancelor of the Exchequer requested that Mr. Davison keep him acquainted with the state of American opinion. One or two of the resulting reports were made available to the Munitions Investigation Committee.

"Special means of obtaining information in order to assist in the development of propaganda appeals were evolved by Sir Gilbert Parker. He 'utilized the friendly service and assistance of confidential friends' to secure reports from important Americans on American opinion. In other words, he secured reports on the reactions of Americans as to what propaganda was succeeding and what was not succeeding, what would probably succeed better, and what measures of repression could be safely pursued. All unfriendly statements were carefully reported and measures were taken to counteract them, or to win their authors to the cause of the Allies. In addition long and detailed analyses of the American newspapers were made each week. In these special attention was paid to unfriendly remarks.

WATCHING THE NEWSPAPERS

"Each division of the propaganda ministry kept a separate record of events in its own field, and used select arguments in its propaganda to be distributed. The daily review of the foreign press which was the comprehensive report of the entire ministry, contained little more than condensations of foreign news. This was probably a result of the fear that this widely circulated report might reach the public. Its confidential supplement, on the other hand, contained material intended only for information of high officials. There were also more detailed, localized reports, such as: Summary of the British press (1916–17); summary of the Provincial press and British papers published abroad (1916 to 1917); summary of the weekly press (September 13 to December 31, 1916); report on Austrian papers (October 23, 1915, to April 1916); report on the French press (June 3, 1915, to January 16, 1916); weekly report on German papers (May 8, 1915, to December 1916).

"One report, much more important than any of the above, as far as the United States was concerned, was the American Press Résumé. It was issued weekly or biweekly from April 12, 1915, to August 8, 1917. The Résumé was printed on blue paper, as was the confidential supplement of the Daily Review of the foreign press, and varied from 6 to 25 pages in length, with occasional supplements of equal size. Although 'printed for the use of the cabinet,' it was also probably distributed to a few of the more important propagandists. It was stamped 'confidential' or 'strictly confidential.' The American Press Résumé was prepared by Sir Gilbert Parker's American Ministry of Information, the department of Wellington House which took care of propaganda for the United States. It was apparently the central report upon which all efforts to educate American opinion were based.

"The weekly analyses of opinion in the Résumé were of especial importance insofar as they revealed the range and influence of propaganda within the United States. One column in the Résumé was headed 'Influencing the American press.' It varied from week to week, but the following excerpts are typical: 'Amongst the thoroughly satisfactory articles upon the British offensive may be mentioned Mr. Frederick Palmer's article in Collier's Weekly'; 'The Literary Digest published long extracts from Dr. Taylor's report on the "Wittenberg camp"'; 'Articles by the following writers have appeared: Mr. Archibald Hurd, Alfred Noyes, Gilbert Murray, and James M. Beck'; 'The pro-Ally Philadelphia Public Ledger writes an editorial upon the pamphlet Treasury Romances, prepared by Wellington House.'

"Besides the weekly tabulation of American newspaper opinion, the Résumés contained reports of individuals in the United States. Parker has told how he secured 'reports from important Americans,' and how 'by personal correspondence with influential and eminent people of every profession' he 'built a backing for the British cause.' The Résumés are a detailed account of these maneuvers, as well as an analyses of the American press.

"The letters of wide interest which Parker received were printed in the Résumé, in which form they served as a guide for the propagandists. As an example, after a particular group of atrocity stories were favorably received, the Résumé of a few weeks later revealed that efforts were made to expand this attack. Then the Résumé reported that 'atrocities are again widely discussed in the United States.' When there was received a statement such as 'The American mind shows signs of being almost surfeited with atrocities,' the ensuing reports evidenced a change of emphasis to the evil war aims of the Germans, or to the illegality and brutality of German naval policy. One letter commented on the fact that the American newspapers were dissatisfied because British leaders would not give out statements to the press. In succeeding issues there were reports of a veritable flood of interviews with British officials.

"MOST EDUCATED ENGLISHMEN ARE SOCIALLY DELIGHTFUL

"Just as they used natives in Africa and Asia, the British did all in their power to enlist Americans as propagandists to overcome the resistance of Americans. One distinguished English expert in this field wrote: 'Better than any pumped-in propaganda abroad was (the) * * * method of making the leaders of the imperial, neutral, or allied press themselves the propagandists when they returned home.' In doing this the British did not attempt bribery. Instead, the 'method chosen was that of direct personal approach.' Most educated Englishmen are socially delightful and in this phase of propaganda they were able to put their charm to work to good advantage. There is a compulsion in friendship which makes disagreement very distasteful and before long the British had eliminated 'disagreement' from their American friends.

"Sir Gilbert Parker has stated that he 'advised and stimulated many people to write articles' and 'asked * * * friends and correspondents to arrange for speeches, debates, and lectures by American citizens.' Especially did he utilize the 'friendly services and assistance of confidential friends.' Here was the real genius of British propaganda organization. In other circles this procedure would be called a 'confidence game.' Eventually, as a result of the propaganda and the campaign to get the friendship of American leaders, almost all articulate Americans were taken into the Allies' camp, to become crusaders for England.

"GIVING TEAS AND DINNERS FOR PROPAGANDA PURPOSES

"Back in England, 'American journalists, publicists, authors, statesmen, greeters, and munition makers' were courted assiduously. 'Clubs were open to them, teas, and dinners were given for them.' 'The American wives of Englishmen, who had already given their proof that blood is thicker than water, led by Lady Astor, formed a battalion of solicitude lest Americans in London become homesick.'

"John St. Loe Strachey had a meeting of American correspondents each week at his home in London. There reporters were given the opportunity to meet some important personage, such as a Cabinet member or a military leader. Men formerly aloof and inaccessible to reporters became very cordial. The personal contacts established at these meetings made censorship less distasteful to the correspondents, and also made it more difficult for those attending to give any but a British interpretation of news—even if it had been possible to get such a version past the censor. The same type of meeting was held by the foreign editor of the London Times.

"CATALOGING AMERICANS

"But newspaper people were not the only Americans who were enlisted to fight Britain's battles. Appeal was systematically made to all classes. One discussion of this problem divided Americans first as to 'particular faiths'; second, 'particular nationalities'; third, 'labor'; fourth, 'intellectuals'; and fifth, the 'average man.' In all these cases it should be remembered that the motive was to secure the active support of the leaders of that particular class.

"PROPAGANDA FOR 'INTELLECTUALS'

"It was in the group known as 'intellectuals' that the best body of propagandists was enlisted. Sir Edward Grey wrote Theodore Roosevelt in September 1914 that he was sending over J. M. Barrie and A. E. W. Mason 'to meet people, particularly those connected with the universities, and explain the British case as regards this war and our view of the issues involved.' Later, with the same purpose in mind, many other writers were sent over. John Masefield was one of the 1916 contingent. Masaryk also 'got in touch with the universities, particularly with historians and economists.' The Central Committee for National Patriotic Organizations kept up the attack on the professors, reporting that 'practically every professor of every faculty has received * * * private packets of literature in his own language.' The result of this work was the enlistment of most of the leaders of intellectual life in America. Headed by such men as Lowell of Harvard and Hibben of Princeton, it was an imposing propaganda group. Dutifully bringing up the rear were the intellectual proletariat, the American school teachers.

"In making an appeal to the 'average man' it was found that this meant an appeal to the politicians. Among these, naturally, the President was the most important. Some difficulty was encountered in attempting to reach Mr. Wilson. But it was accomplished by gaining the friendship of his personal adviser, Colonel House, who was early enlisted in the cause of the Allies. The first to insinuate himself into the confidence of House was the British naval attaché,

Capt. Guy Gaunt. Another was Sir William Wiseman. Both of these men were agents of Admiral Hall, chief of British naval intelligence. Sir Edward Grey also captivated the mysterious colonel and hence, indirectly, President Wilson. In addition, he developed friendships of convenience with House, Page, and Roosevelt.

"HIDING BRITISH PROPAGANDA UNDER AMERICAN NAMES

"Among the groups which dealt exclusively with propaganda was the Pilgrim's Society in England under Harry Brittain. This organization fostered the 'hands-across-the-sea' movement, which made a very strong appeal to Americans. The Pilgrims Club was similarly effective and received the commendation of Sir Gilbert Parker. An example of the local organizations was the British-American League in southern California. A traveling agent of the British propaganda ministry reported that when this was started it 'brought forth such a stormy campaign from the Germans that it forced these good British-Americans to seek immediate cover.' However, this did not mean discontinuance of the work. The agent informed Parker that 'the purpose and activities of the earlier organization are now concealed and conducted under the guise of an Allies Aid Association, an avowedly philanthropic body, of which Mr. Edmund Mitchel is the prime and ardent mover.'

"The great success of British propaganda in the United States should not be attributed to a professional group of propagandists, but to native Americans—volunteer propagandists. These were individually enlisted in some cases, but in the main were regimented into 'soldiers of the king' by a process of eliminating, or at least curtailing, enemy interpretations of the war and by dominating the news with exaggerated and warped pro-Ally accounts of what was happening or had happened. Once these natives had acquired the 'correct' frame of mind they were enlisted for the 'duration of the war.' The formal propaganda groups acted merely as connecting and reinforcing elements of the British propaganda organizations. The real propagandists were Americans—our preachers, teachers, politicians, and journalists.

"MAKING THE WAR 'OUR WAR'

"The attempt to identify the interests and ideals of the United States with those of England dominated all British propaganda. Every possible effort was made to make Americans feel that the war was 'our fight.' Every possible point of similarity between the two countries was stressed and restressed. The news and other printed matter released in the American press was so written that the reader would feel that his interests and hopes were in some way involved in the war. The British propaganda ministry always gave great prominence in their reports to such American headlines as 'England's defeat our defeat.' At one time it was cheerfully reported that the pro-Ally newspapers 'believe that Great Britain is fighting America's battle; that the future of democracy is at stake; and that the United States will have to fight for it, if not now, then hereafter * * *.' The implications are clear. A vital part of these arguments was the contention that Great Britain and the United States were sister democracies. This later developed into the argument of democracy versus autocracy. Eventually the idea became current that for an American to be pro-Ally was patriotic, and for him to be pro-German was to be anti-American. In other words, the British captured the American flag and waved it in front of themselves.

"Aided by the realities of submarine warfare, the contention was made that the United States was actually menaced by Germany. The success of this argument is demonstrated in the statement of Senator Lawrence Y. Sherman, who remarked, 'I do not think we embarked in the war in a humanitarian crusade. It was for self-defense.' The 'our fight' idea culminated in the assertion that the Monroe Doctrine would be violated if the Germans were victorious.

"PROPAGANDA IN THE SCHOOLS

"Starting as early as August 1914 prominent men of America hastened to join a cause that was intellectually fashionable. Industrialists and financiers, one by one, took up the cudgels for the belligerents with whom they were doing so much profitable business. Preceding them came the imposing array of American society women. They swung into action with great gusto—at long last finding a cause worthy of their talents. Politicians, with the instinct of the chameleon, caught and reflected the popular shades of opinion. College professors and school teachers repeated with a great show of wisdom the arguments which had originated in Wellington House or in la maison de la presse. Close behind the educators came the ministers, and before long the American clergy was preaching a holy war, enlisting God and the Bible in the cause which newspapers told them was righteous. Just as strange as the enlistment of the clergy was the enlistment of liberals throughout the country. Usually such individuals spend most of their time talking about the value of peace. When it came down to hard realities, a large number of these people was found on the popular side assisting in establishing a climate of opinion favorable to war.

"By February 1916 Sir Gilbert Parker was able to report that the articulate people throughout the United States had joined the Allies. The success of the British propagandists corroborates the statement that there are no limits to the field of propaganda. The only restrictions are on the manner of approach. The wealthy can be persuaded to support a cause by getting them to invest their money in it; educators can be controlled simply through controlling their reading matter; liberals and preachers are the easiest of all to enlist by the mere introduction of an idealistic flavor to the propaganda.

"It must not be assumed, however, that Americans who became adherents of the Allies were insincere. They honestly believed the interpretations of the news which were presented to them. They were convinced that here was something worth fighting for and that they would be unworthy of American ideals if they did not advocate the defeat of the Central Powers. Indeed, some of them were ashamed because the United States was not already in the war.

"COMPARISON OF ACTION ON GORE-M'LEMORE RESOLUTION WITH 1939

"In the Senate the Gore resolution met the same fate. Although there were some rather devious political maneuvers in connection with the vote, they only served to confuse an otherwise clear issue. Senator Vardaman has stated: 'If the resolution proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma had been adopted by the Congress as it was originally introduced, in my judgment, the probabilities of war would have vanished as a nightmare from the troubled brain of innocence.' With the failure of these two resolutions there disappeared the last hope for American peace.

"Sir Gilbert Parker reported to the British Cabinet that if the President of the United States had not fought the measure it 'might have turned out most unfavorably to Great Britain.' Others agree that without Wilson's support the Anglophiles could not have defeated these resolutions. As Senator Gore has remarked when Wilson gave the word, those in command of the two Houses ran the steam roller over the opposition. The McLemore resolution was defeated by 276 to 142. There were 183 Democrats and 93 Republicans who voted against the bill while 35 Democrats and 107 Republicans voted for it. The vote tells almost the entire story. In spite of the fact that most of the jingoistic comments in Congress were coming from the Republican side of the House, these advocates of war still could not command a majority of their own party. On the other hand, although these resolutions were Democratic in origin, and had had the support of most of the Democratic leaders, when the vote was taken it was the Democrats who defeated them. It was only by forcing the members of his own party into line that Wilson was able to defeat the measures.

"It is impossible to read the speeches in connection with the debates in Congress over these measures without feeling that the sentiment there was decidedly against entering the war. Unfortunately, only a few Members of Congress had a full realization of the meaning of the resolutions. They closed their eyes to the fact that failure of the bills meant the end of American peace.

"Champ Clark said at the time of the McLemore debate that the true feeling of the House was 2 to 1 against travel by Americans on armed ships. A recent writer has stated that all the Democratic leaders and two-thirds of the Members of both Houses favored such a resolution, while a newspaperman of that day remarked that the advantage was about 4 to 1 in favor of the measure. The truth of the matter was that Congress, as well as the public, wished steps to be taken which would eliminate the possibility of the United States being involved in the European struggle. But Wilson and the newspapers were shouting against unpatriotic people who were willing to surrender American rights. The President and the press were not reflecting the will of the public, and by waving the flag managed to defeat that will.

"After these two bills had been defeated, Robert N. Page, a Member of Congress, issued an open letter stating, 'Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also. The loan of $500,000,000 to England (sic) by American capitalists, to say nothing of the profits of munitions manufacturers, has destroyed the semblance even of neutrality in the United States and will probably lead us into war.' A few days later the New York Times ran a cartoon in which Page appeared as a 'shade of Benedict Arnold.' The logic is not clear, but at least it explains the position of the Times.

"The individuals in the United States who were espousing the cause of American entrance into the war said that the people opposing Wilson in the armed-ship controversy were pro-German. But the British propagandists did not think so. One of them reported: 'It is quite untrue to say that this opposition to the President is mainly pro-German. * * * It is the more or less representative expression of the "pacifist" sentiment which is a genuine American article, and is very prevalent both in the agricultural districts of the Middle West and in the far West as a whole.'

"AROUSING OUR PEOPLE

"By the middle of 1916 the principal propaganda work in the United States was in the hands of Americans. Anglo-Americans and ordinary Anglophiles from New Haven to San Francisco were doing all in their power to assist the British cause. One of the many American visitors to Europe who had been under Parker's supervision, wrote to him as follows: 'Since my return to Richmond I have been kept busy making speeches' to give Americans 'a proper appreciation of the aims of the Allies. I hope that my efforts * * * may do some good.' One worker for the Allies wrote to a prominent publisher: 'I do appreciate the excellent work you are doing in arousing our people and wish you could go to Denver and San Francisco. They need light in the West badly.'

"USES OF PICTURES FOR PROPAGANDA

"It is interesting to note here as well as in other phases of propaganda, the most effective work was done by Americans. The motion picture entitled 'The Battle Cry of Peace,' which has already been mentioned, was, in the opinion of Ambassador Jusserand, more effective than an army of conferences.

"Cartoons, always popular with the public, were issued in great numbers. Raemakers, the Hollander, immortalized the atrocity stories, and other cartoonists of much less fame contributed their bit toward objectifying the Allies' cause. More dignified drawings were turned out by Muirhead Bone, who was the first of many official artists at the front appointed by Wellington House.

"A tremendously important department of the American Ministry of Information was that which issued photographs. These were 'distributed through the International Film Service, the American Press Association, and other agencies.' One propagandist wrote: 'Opportunities for utilizing official photographs seemed to increase every day. In addition to supplying the necessary illustrations for all our official books and pamphlets and our own lavishly illustrated publications, either conducted or subsidized by Wellington House, we sent forth countless thousands of prints for reproductions in newspapers, magazines, and periodicals outside Great Britain in neutral and allied countries, and in the British Empire.'

"This pictorial department of Wellington House supplied the American press very liberally with photographs. It issued 'a monthly illustrated magazine called The War Pictorial, which was sent out every month in * * * (a) bewildering variety of languages * * *.' In his report of August 16, 1916, Parker was able to say that 'pictures supplied by Wellington House to the American papers are conspicuous in the Sunday editions, and on front pages of papers of every locality.' The following week he gave a tremendously long list of weeklies and dailies which carried photographs emanating from Wellington House.

"FIGHTING OUR FIGHT

"British propaganda of the last year of neutrality was characterized by continued attempts to establish the conviction in the minds of Americans that their interests and aspirations were directly involved in the Allies' cause. The native propagandists were contending that the war was 'our war,' that the Allies were fighting 'our fight.' It was hoped by Parker that the activity of the U–53 near the American coast would be very helpful in this propaganda. He felt that it destroyed some of the remoteness of the war for Americans, stating: The 'startling proximiity of the occurrence is bound to be of far-reaching and beneficial influence. It frightened a good many people rather badly, which * * * was a most desirable result. I wish (the Germans) had thought of doing something of the sort long ago.' Unfortunately, he had to admit a little later that the U–53's exploits had not produced the reaction for which he had hoped.

"An Anglo-American friend of Sir Gilbert Parker, and also of Theodore Roosevelt, thought he was being original when he suggested that Wellington House should 'publish an article by a well-known British authority * * * on the subject of Anglo-American relations in order to show that the interests of the United States and of the British Empire run parallel in most parts of the world.' In April Bonar Law gave an interview, at the instigation of Parker, on the danger of a German invasion of the United States. It will be remembered that this was the tenor of the motion picture, The Battle Cry of Peace. In May Lord Cromer gave an interview entitled 'England's Defeat Our Defeat.' In order to establish a belief in the identity of interests of Great Britain and the United States, John Masefield even suggested: 'A big application of the idea of the Rhodes scholarships' along with public mark of thanks to Yale or Harvard for their sons who have served the Allies might be of great value. He commented, 'Some few scraps of autograph by famous English writers would be ample for the purpose.'

"EDUCATIONAL WORK

"Both the Morgan firm and Wellington House did their utmost to get the proper educational material before the American public. On November 24 Morgan cabled to Paris: 'We want you to know that we are engaged in steady educational work' to prepare the way for another French loan.

"STOP THE PEACE TALK

"Wellington House also gave expression to the anxiety caused by these rumors of peace. As early as August 6, 1915, it was stated: 'In the near future a serious effort will become necessary to counteract the peace propaganda in the United States. The task may be difficult.' There is 'a very great danger in this peace talk with its consequent stimulation of the peace longing.' Regularly after this time additional warnings were made until the report of November 29, 1916, which stated: 'Peace talk is vastly upon the increase. If, therefore, it is desired to prevent or counteract the further growth of peace sentiment in the United States, it may be necessary to take timely and definite steps.'

"CALL THEM PRO-GERMAN

"By the spring of 1917 the reluctance of the American people to enter the war was no longer of great importance. Those individuals who opposed entrance into the conflict were labeled unpatriotic or pro-German; consequently their influence was eliminated. Only the war hawks dared speak out without restraint. Under such circumstances the Government could enter the war without paying much attention to the public. In actuality this meant that the President alone would make the decision for the Nation."

In a book, The Road to War, that opened the eyes of many, Walter Millis did an excellent job. Quotations from this book follow:

"IN 1914 IT WAS CALLED 'OUR WAR'

"As early as the first week of the war the great London Times had made the peculiar but satisfactory discovery that 'Americans are now beginning to appreciate that the rise of Germany to the power and influence hitherto enjoyed by Great Britain would be a development inimical to American interests and a menace to the freedom of the United States as a world power.'

"H. G. WELLS ON WORLD WAR

"* * * On August 5 the New York Times published a column and a half justification of the British entry into the war under the signature, oddly enough, of no less a liberal and a pacifist than Mr. H. G. Wells:

" 'That trampling, drilling foolery in the heart of Europe that has arrested civilization and darkened the hopes of mankind for 40 years—German imperialism and German militarism—has struck its inevitable blow. * * * Never was a war so righteous as is the war against Germany now. * * * [The military outcome] will be more or less definitely decided within the next 2 or 3 months. By that time, I believe, German imperialism will be shattered, and it may be possible to anticipate the end of the armaments phase of European history. France, Italy, England, and all the smaller powers of Europe are now pacific countries. Russia * * * will be too exhausted for further adventure. Shattered Germany will be revolutionary. * * * The way will be open at last for all these western powers to organize peace. That is why I, with my declared horror of war, did not sign any of these "stop the war" appeals. * * * Now is the sword drawn for peace.'

"Mr. Wells, like the rest of us who were to adopt his argument, is now aware of the baseless character of that reasoning. Yet one can hardly accuse him of seeking, on August 5, 1914, deliberately to mislead American opinion; rather it was himself whom he was misleading in a passionate effort to reestablish his own intellectual integrity. The effect, however, was the same; and the 'war to end war,' like the war to end 'autocracy,' had entered the American ideology long before President Wilson had even thought of endowing it with the great power of his rhetoric. Mr. Wells' contribution, moreover, was but the first wavelet of the flood which was to roll in without interruption for 2½ years thereafter—from the Allied side. But not from the German. On August 5 the British Navy dredged up and cut the German cables, and on August 6 there was not a single Berlin or Vienna date line in the American press.

"LENDING THE PEN FOR THE BRITISH CASE

"From the very first the best propagandists of all were the Americans who gave their passionate and vocal sympathies to the Allied cause. Second only to them were the great men of British letters, who had been read and revered throughout the United States, and whose sincerity was never, of course, in question. Sir Edward Grey, in his first letter to Mr. Roosevelt after the outbreak of the war, introduced 'J. M. Barrie and A. E. W. Mason, some of whose books you have no doubt read,' and who were already on their way to the United States. 'Their object is, as I understand, not to make speeches or give lectures'; it was merely 'to meet people, particularly those connected with universities, and explain the British case as regards this war.' Lord Bryce, that distinguished liberal, that great authority on American politics, that friendly pillar through so many years in the American scene, threw himself into a patriotic correspondence with Americans from the outset. He 'lent his pen readily to the development of the British case,' as his biographer observes, and sought by every kind of high-minded suggestion to embroil the American people in its defense.

"MAKING IT APPEAR A STRUGGLE FOR FREEDOM

"PROPAGANDA OF FEAR: DANGER OF INVASION

"* * * At a dinner given by the Pilgrim Society in New York to Mr. Alfred Noyes and Sir Walter Raleigh, the eminent poet solemnly warned his hearers that Germany was contemplating establishing colonies in South America in contravention of the Monroe Doctrine. 'I have in my possession,' said the author of The Barrel Organ, 'an atlas published in Germany. * * * This contains a map of South America upon which 25 or 30 places are inscribed in red as German colonies'; and the listeners were amazed at this crushing proof of the perfidy of the Teuton. As Dr. Butler (he was again presiding) gracefully put it, Americans who had long striven to be neutral, though intelligent, had gathered there that day 'to show how to be intelligent, though neutral.'

"USE OF THE PUBLISHED WORD FOR PROPAGANDA

"* * * They appreciated, no less than Sir Gilbert Parker, the importance of getting native Americans to present their case; but where the Allies could command their thousands of devoted American propagandists, the Germans could find scarcely a handful. A list they drew up of possible native spokesmen contained only 33 names—a pitiful showing. The Allied propaganda, moreover, enjoyed the inestimable advantage of being self-financing. Our public clamored for the books, articles, and motion-picture films which conveyed it. Old-established American publishing houses found it profitable, and did not think it unpatriotic, to enter into agreements with the Entente governments for the distribution of propagandist war books, and there was a huge trade in volumes on trench life from the French and British standpoint. Those who voiced the German side of the case found no such markets. The German representatives in the United States were led, not unnaturally, to supply them secretly with assistance."

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

George Washington, in his Farewell Address, predicted the danger of those who would stand in the way of foreign influence. He said:

"Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorite are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests."

When persons speak of atrocity stories, cite them to the book, Johnny Got His Gun, or just read part of the review of the book by Bruce Catton:

" 'Johnny' blasts his way into your consciousness with the same explosive and horrifying reality as the shells that claimed Johnny's arms, legs, his hearing, his sight, and finally his face. When war had finished with him, only a shell of the original Johnny remained—a helpless torso housing a fully conscious, remembering mind.

"Listen to Johnny's appeal tapped out painfully in Morse code. Imagine, if you can, his half head beating out these words against his pillow:

" 'Let me out of here, let me out. I won't give you any trouble. * * * Take off my nightshirt and build a glass case for me and take me down to the places where people are having fun, where they are on the lookout for freakish things. * * *

" 'I am the dead-man-who-is-alive. I am the living man-who-is-dead. * * * I'm the man who made the world safe for democracy. * * *

" 'Believe it or not, this thing thinks and it is alive and it goes against every rule of Nature, although Nature didn't make it so. You know what made it so. Look at its medals, real medals, probably of solid gold. * * * It stinks of glory. * * *

" 'Take me wherever there are parliaments and diets and congresses and chambers of statesmen. I want to be there when they talk about honor and justice and making the world safe for democracy, and 14 points, and the self-determination of peoples. I want to be there to remind them I haven't got a tongue to stick into the cheek I haven't got either.

" 'Put my glass case on the speaker's desk. * * * Then let them speak of trade policies and embargoes and new colonies and old grudges. Let them debate the menace of the yellow race and the white man's burden and the course of empire. * * *

" 'But before they vote * * * before they give the order for all the little guys to start killing each other, let the main guy rap his gavel on my case and point down at me and say, here, gentlemen, is the only issue before this house, and that is, are you for this thing or are you against it.' "

If propaganda is successful, the 50,000 will change place with the 100,000,000, and again we will have another A. E. F.

Don't be afraid to do your duty because somebody will call you names. Your obligation is to America. Let's whip the propagandists—those here and those abroad—and keep out of war.

It will be recalled those who tried to keep the United States out of the World War were called pro-Germans. Public opinion had been whipped into this rage by propaganda. Let's be careful we do not duplicate the trip down the same road.

This foreign propaganda is a road to war. Americanism calls for the road to peace. Let's investigate all of the foreign propaganda—German, French, English, and all other nations. Let's expose those who are trying to poison the springs of information. We owe that duty to the boys of America who will pay the penalty if we do not "make certain that the small decisions of each day do not lead toward war." The purpose of propaganda is to get us in. The purpose of exposing propaganda is to keep us out.

OF

HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

SPEECH OF HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER, OF MAINE

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech I delivered at the annual meeting of the Three-Quarter Century Club at Dover-Foxcroft, Maine, Thursday afternoon, August 31, 1939:

The thirteenth birthday anniversary of the Three Quarter Century Club of Maine comes most appropriately in the home town of Dr. E. D. Merrill who, as president of the Maine Public Health Association, first conceived the idea of this unique association and presided at its birth.

Research had disclosed that Maine had a higher percentage of long-lived people than any other State. The State of Maine was then inaugurating its official activities in publicizing Maine's attractions and possibilities throughout the United States and the Three Quarter Century Club seemed to have a unique appeal in presenting Maine as a great State in which to live in contrast to some of our sister States who were then emphasizing their inheritance tax advantages as offering a location in which it was most advantageous to pass on.

The first meeting was held on the statehouse grounds at Augusta, and was an instant and country-wide success in its publicity appeal. The response of our senior citizens was overwhelming and their cooperation has continued these annual gatherings and reveals each year new possibilities far exceeding the dreams of its founders.

Maine presents to everyone the realization that we should place no limits upon life.

It is a great pleasure here in his own home town to join with people of all ages in paying tribute to the founder of the Three Quarter Century Club and to one who may sometime be old enough to be its president, Dr. E. D. Merrill, of Dover-Foxcroft.

The Special Session

OF

HON. KNUTE HILL

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, the special session of Congress convened and is about to adjourn. The purpose declared by the President in his call for the special session was to repeal the arms embargo and so modify our so-called neutrality law as to most likely keep our country from involvement in the present conflict in Europe. It has been charged that the administration brought pressure for repeal to bear on Members. This certainly was not true as to me. I was not urged by any of the leadership for repeal; not only this, but the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, after repeatedly promising me 15 minutes in which to give my reasons for voting for the Pittman bill closed the debate without granting me that privilege. So I voted my own convictions in the matter and according to my best judgment. It is only fair to myself and to the people of the State of Washington, however, that I state my reasons for so voting, and I, therefore, am using the privilege granted to all Members to extend their remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

During the extensive debate in the Senate and in the House of Representatives and even over the radio by Members, much was said about war. War! A last relic of barbarism and savagery. Conceived in greed, born and nurtured in hatred, carried on by the lusts and ruthlessness of man's lower nature and always ending in a Machiavellian truce—not a permanent peace. An overwhelming majority of men and women everywhere abhor and hate war. The President hates war. The Members of the Senate and the House hate war—they have said so time and again on the floor. We all hate war and will do our utmost to keep our country out of the present World War. General Sherman wisely said: "War is hell." The close of the last World War is too recent to permit any of us to soon forget its sufferings and tragic aftermath.

But war was not the issue during the special session and much oratory was beside the point. The real and only issue was what can Congress do to most likely keep our country from becoming entangled. It was a matter of method. Both sides to the controversy claimed their method was neutral. As a matter of fact regardless of either legislation we are neutral until we actually declare war. However, in neither case could we be impartial. Under the law of 1937 we were favoring Germany, a land power; under the enacted law we are favoring England and France, sea powers. Why deny a palpable fact? But since we are not participating in this terrible game of war who is there to deny us the right to change our own domestic laws in such a way as to lessen our chances for entrance into a game not of our making? Certainly not Germany which has violated in both these World Wars every rule of international law, raped Belgium in the first one and Poland in this one. I hold no brief for England.

It is true that she "comes into court with soiled hands." Oh, such guilty hands! The Revolution, the War of 1812, the early incitements to Indian massacres in the Mississippi Valley, opium trade in China, India, the Boers, Ireland! But add all these atrocities up and the total sum is infinitesimal as compared to the ruthless reign of Hitlerism.

England respects religion and defends democracy and loves liberty; Hitlerism crucifies Christ anew every day in mass murders of men and women and children of all denominations, rapes religion, denounces democracy, and challenges civilization. For my part, if legislation results in partiality, I want to favor those nations which have, at least, a semblance of democracy and Christianity. Should the repeal have failed the Nazis and Communists would have rejoiced. How the gentleman from New York, the gentle author of The Man Nobody Knows and The Book Nobody Knows, and the gentleman from Missouri, the one-time minister of the gospel, could see fit to lend comfort to Hitler and Stalin is beyond my comprehension. No one questions the sincerity of these two Members, but they must be held responsible for the results of their votes favoring Russia and Germany.

The debate in both Houses was, on the whole, not partisan, nor was there, for the most part, any question of motives. That there were exceptions cannot be denied. Some voted for repeal because they hated Hitler. Hitlerism is diabolical and should be obliterated from the face of the earth. But let us remember that Stalin, Mussolini, and Hitler are effects, not causes. Had there been no Czars, there could never have been a Lenin or Stalin. Had there been no Versailles, with its crafty and cunning Clemenceau and Lloyd George, there could never have been a Hitler. Some voted against repeal because they hate Roosevelt. I heard one Member say: "The President is deliberately planning to get us into this war." Such an unfair and biased accusation deserves only one rejoinder—that it is a base falsehood. I have at times differed with the President, and shall, no doubt, do so in the future. But to charge him or any other responsible public official today with deliberately planning to plunge us into war is so palpably prompted by malice that it deserves rebuke. Others voted against repeal because they hate the Jews. Let me remind them that, although that race still has its Shylocks, far too many of them—nevertheless it gave us the Great Master, the Lowly Nazarene, whose life and ideals will make the world safe for Christianity. It gave to us the Book of Books. It gave to this Nation two of its greatest Supreme Court Justices, Brandeis and Cardozo.

Much antirepeal propaganda based on misinformation and misleading reports from Washington, D. C., flooded both the Senate and the House. I will cite just one instance. The following item was from a syndicated article in my home paper by a Washington, D. C., reporter:

> Here is something that doesn't make sense: According to newspapers, polls taken in the Pacific Northwest show that 75 percent of the people are for repeal of the mandatory embargo on weapons of war but the ratio of letters received by Oregon-Washington Members of Congress run 80 to 90 percent against repeal. Even dismissing the engineered propaganda such as printed postal cards the letters run 65 percent or more to retain the embargo. There is difficulty in reconciling the wide discrepancy.

What are the facts? I contacted both the Oregon and the Washington delegations. The former had been interviewed and two of the delegation said the statement was correct. I quote from the letter of the third:

> Letters received at this office are strongly for the repeal of the present so-called Neutrality Act and for the enactment of the cash-and-carry law, but if we include the printed postal cards and other communications which are clearly propaganda then the preponderance of letters and postal cards is decidedly against any change in the present law.

On the other hand, not one of the Washington delegation was contacted by the reporter at all. Our mail is at least 60 to 40 percent and in one instance 80 percent prorepeal and 20 percent against repeal.

Just why did this reporter misinform our people back home? Had he made it a partisan issue and contacted only Oregon Members, or did he merely ignore the majority Members from these two States and consider the State of Washington below his dignity to interview and correctly report?

The effect of such misinformation was to spur antirepealists in their charges that we did not reflect the sentiment at home. From constituents coming into our offices and from reliable reports it can be truthfully stated that more than 75 percent of the people of the State of Washington, all of whom abhor war, favored the Pittman bill.

Most of the letters and telegrams opposing repeal were sincere protests, and I regretted the necessity of voting against their wishes. But as the question of which method was most likely to keep us out of war was one of judgment and not of principle, I felt bound to reflect the judgment of a majority of my constituents on this issue.

However, although I voted in the last session to retain the arms embargo, I was convinced after hearing the debates and reading both sides of the issue that the Pittman bill was preferable.

Under the 1937 act Mussolini secured war materials with which to conquer Ethiopia; Japan has been purchasing scrap iron with which to devastate helpless China; General Franco—through Mussolini and Hitler—was able to defeat the de facto government in Spain. I am not here discussing the merits of the contending forces in Spain. I merely state the fact that the law permitted a rebel in a friendly country to overthrow a legal government set up by the people of that country. And, by the way, the junior Senator from North Dakota at that time urged lifting the arms embargo against Spain because he sympathized with her governing authorities but now vociferously opposes lifting it in favor of England, France, and Poland. Moreover, if it is wrong to sell arms to the belligerents, why is it not wrong also to sell them food, clothing, steel, gas, oil, and numberless articles which are absolutely necessary for warfare?

The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] pictured a devastating scene in the wake of a bomber over a defenseless village. It was truly terrible. But could that bombing plane have rained down upon that village that destructive hell fire if it had been without the gas and oil we so readily furnished? Some gentlemen like ex-President Hoover and Colonel Lindbergh attempt to distinguish between defensive and offensive weapons. The same weapons may be used either for defense or offense. As a matter of fact practically all kinds of materials shipped to a belligerent are sent to the front to sustain the army; that is why it is declared and seized as contraband of war. So to be consistent we should either refuse to sell all materials to all belligerents or else sell all materials to all belligerents. Personally I would favor the first.

Under the 1937 act our ships can carry contraband of war upon the seven seas to be seized or sunk as in the World War, and our citizens may sail aboard belligerent vessels as they did on the Lusitania. That led to our entrance in the last war and would eventually lead to the same in this war. Only a few weeks ago the sinking of the Athenia with Americans aboard and the seizure of the Flint because of carrying contraband tended to promote war hysteria and caused the State Department anxiety. The Pittman Act provides for cash and carry with title passing to purchaser before leaving port and prohibits our vessels or citizens from entering war zones. If they do so, it is at their own risk. The law just enacted prohibits also any credit to foreign countries—a somewhat prolific cause for entry into the World War.

Although there are estimable and sincere Members on opposite sides of this issue, let us compare just a few. Senators BORAH and JOHNSON are outspoken isolationists. Senator NORRIS is for the Pittman bill. Mr. BORAH and Mr. JOHNSON voted for entrance into the World War; Mr. NORRIS voted against it.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. JOHNSON with the late Senator Lodge defeated the League of Nations, the first proposed great step to punish aggressors and guarantee permanent world peace.

I know it is said the League is a farce. But had President Wilson insisted on his 14 points he could have succeeded. And with that as a basis and the powerful United States a member the League would have functioned and Mussolini and Hitler could never have bluffed their way through to conquest. Again, Mr. BORAH and Mr. JOHNSON only last spring insisted on the outworn doctrine during a world war of "the freedom of the seas." Senator LUNDEEN is an outspoken isolationist and advocate of peace; yet he proposed a real provocation to war—the seizure of the Bahamas and Bermuda on the flimsy excuse that Great Britain is too busy elsewhere now. For my part, rather than join with Mr. BORAH and Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. NYE and Mr. LUNDEEN in this crisis, I would follow the leadership of that matchless statesman of the past three decades, Senator NORRIS, who in spite of threats and ridicule and persecution risked his political future and voted against entering the last holocaust. He has lived to see himself vindicated and also to see his dreams of constructive development of our country come true. He favored the Pittman bill because he still opposes war and believes that is the safest way.

The coming year will make evident whether this policy was the wisest to pursue. Should this prove to be true, then we who won should be thankful, not boastful.

Lastly, although we consistently and persistently refuse to take part in Europe's or Asia's wars, we must be ready to aid in the building of a lasting peace, based on fairness and justice. We as the most powerful and wealthy nation can and ought to send a nonpartisan commission at the close of this war to consult and advise and even insist on a treaty of peace—not another truce—which shall unite the whole family of nations to plan for constructive not destructive activities, on waging war not on each other but on poverty, injustice, intolerance, and ignorance, and for truth, cooperation, and progress.

To better lay claim to this intercession and to better accomplish these ends we as a nation should bend every effort to make this Western Hemisphere, and especially our country, safe for democracy and Christianity. Our United States could well be a model for a United States of Europe. But we need to "set our own house in order." I voted against adjournment because we have such a multitude of pressing domestic problems demanding consideration and early solution. To my mind it was bad enough to sit with folded hands in the House while the Senate for a month debated the embargo issue. As long as we were convened in session there was no legitimate reason why our committees could not have been meeting and laying plans for necessary legislation. At least after the chief cause for our convening had been disposed of it would seem that we could have profitably taken up such matters as unemployment, more acute than ever; farm cost-of-production; a sane system of marketing and distribution of the products of both farm and factory; a simple yet workable and efficient monetary system; the broadening of the tax basis and the enactment of tax legislation to more equitably place the burden on the shoulders of those best able to pay; the drafting and enactment of such a tax on excess profits as to forever discourage the mania for war profits; the liberalizing of our old-age-pension system so as to drive from the minds of all in the sunset of life the dread specter of fear, want, and misery. These and other serious matters—fully as serious to our people as the war in Europe—can ill await the coming of the regular session. For several weeks in the coming session there will be, as usual, the delay customary to the opening of a new session. Then the call of the coming party conventions and the exciting campaign will be upon the Congress. Politics will again be in the saddle and promises will outrun and outride performances. It would seem more in keeping with our past promises, both of Republicans and of Democrats, that matters concerning the very lives and employment and comfort and happiness of our people should be our first concern this fall, this winter, and next spring. It is my firm belief and contention that promises fulfilled become the best politics.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES COMMEMORATING THE ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF THOMAS BRACKETT REED

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks I am most happy to incorporate a summary of exercises held in the Bowdoin College Chapel, Brunswick, Maine, at 3 p. m. Wednesday, October 8, 1939, in commemoration of the centennial of Thomas Brackett Reed, of the Bowdoin Class of 1860, broadcast over station WGAN, Portland.

The services were opened with the singing of America, led by the Bowdoin College Chapel Choir, Frederic E. T. Tillotson, director. The presiding officer, President Kenneth C. M. Sills, LL. D., of Bowdoin College, then read the following telegram from Senator WALLACE H. WHITE, Jr., of the Bowdoin Class of 1899:

In character and public service Thomas B. Reed was an example and an inspiration. Brilliance of mind, extraordinary power of incisive speech, industry in study and in legislative task, keen judgment of men and events, and an intellectual honesty and courage that knew no compromise with right, all contributed to universal respect and brought recognition of him as one of the country's outstanding figures of his generation. May I join with you in honoring his memory.

WALLACE H. WHITE, Jr.

President Sills then spoke as follows:

Bowdoin College joins the State of Maine today in honoring a great American. Thomas Brackett Reed once said, "The glory and dignity of a college are not fixed by the number but by the quality of those who come out of it." Bowdoin is proud of its contribution to the Nation, when toward the close of the last century three Bowdoin graduates presided over three great Federal bodies: Melville W. Fuller, of the class of 1853, was Chief Justice of the United States; William P. Frye, of the class of 1850, was President pro tempore of the Senate; Thomas B. Reed, of the class of 1860, was Speaker of the House of Representatives. Speaker Reed, by his integrity, by his intellectual courage and independence, by his wit, by his wide knowledge of books and men, by his devotion to the public service, is a fine model for all of our American youth today. He was very much of a party man; he believed in his party; he was a hardy opponent. Some remember his famous retort when he was asked if he knew the meaning of the word "paleontology": "Indeed I do," he replied, "it is the scientific history of the Democratic Party." But strong Republican though he was, he opposed our entrance into the Spanish War and later resigned his high office of Speaker because he could not support the imperialistic policy of the McKinley administration. He had, too, the philosophy of a man of affairs.

It is not only the great and well-known men who bring credit to a college or a State. "Fame," he told us once at a commencement dinner here, "Fame is a curious thing; fame is largely a matter of accident; you happen to be in a place where you do a thing well, or people think you do it well, and you get the fame others might just as well have had under slightly different circumstances." But fame aside, he rendered a great service to American life by making the House function; he was a great political figure who never trimmed his sails to any passing breeze, nor ever flew a doubtful flag. We need men of his stature, his ability, his independence, his rigorous intellectual honesty, in all walks of public life today.

And from his centennial address at Bowdoin in 1902 these words have a timely and timeless message:

"Survival of the strongest may be new to science but it is not new to religion. The strong remorseless arm striking down the weak and possessing the earth, the unpitying tramp of the horses' hoofs devastating the lands are well known to the years that have gone and they filled the thoughts of men; but they are no longer supremely prevalent on earth. Whatever contribution any man makes to humanity and justice will not be lost but will be gathered up and be among the treasures of the Almighty."

The second speaker was Fulton J. Redman, of the Bowdoin Class of 1907, introduced by President Sills as newspaper commentator and one of the leaders of the Democratic Party in Maine, whose remarks follow:

President Sills, distinguished guests, and friends of the college, it is sometimes true of individuals who have attained distinction in life that they are lacking in the loyalties which humbler men so often possess.

There is strong proof to indicate that Thomas Brackett Reed, distinguished son of Bowdoin, and for a number of years in his lifetime the "first citizen" of our State, could have had the nomination for President in 1888, when his party carried the country. His loyalties prevented him from accepting united support, which was tendered to him as a compromise candidate during the Republican Convention deadlock in that year.

Thomas B. Reed attended as a delegate from Maine, and in the convention city of Chicago shared a modest hotel suite with the late John W. Simpson, prominent New York lawyer and head of a law firm with which Reed himself became associated after leaving Congress some years later. It will be recalled that James G. Blaine had been the Republican nominee 4 years previously, in 1884; and Blaine had been beaten by Grover Cleveland in the "rum, Romanism, and rebellion" campaign. In the Chicago convention of 1888 there were 14 favorite sons on the convention's first ballot; but many observers believed that the nomination of Mr. Blaine would be the probable outcome of the contest. A Blaine stampede was the ultimate event which the whole country expected. Reed was among a group of delegates, from Maine and elsewhere, who had gone to Chicago with the intention of being for Blaine right through to the end.

The convention lasted from Tuesday through the remainder of the week and on Saturday was hopelessly deadlocked. Conferences were held over the week end and in the early morning hours—about 3:30 a. m. on Monday—a group of delegates came to Mr. Reed's hotel room. It contained, among others, Chauncey M. Depew and Tom Platt, of the New York delegation—Depew himself had received over 90 votes on each of the first 3 ballots; it also contained leaders from the Pennsylvania delegation and a number of leaders from other pivotal States. The spokesmen told Reed that the group in the room represented enough delegates and had promises of votes sufficient in number to nominate him for President.

It was further stated that James G. Blaine could not possibly be nominated, and those present urged Reed to consent to let them nominate him, he being the compromise candidate upon whom they could all agree.

Thomas B. Reed, a son of this college, replied that he had come to the convention pledged to be for Blaine "first, last, and all the time"; that he intended to live up to the spirit and letter of this, and under no circumstances would he countenance a movement in his own favor, such as they proposed.

The convention balloted three times later in that same day, and on the third ballot Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana, was nominated. On this final ballot Thomas B. Reed was 1 of 5, out of 830 delegates, who voted for James G. Blaine, of Maine, thus living up to the pledge of "first, last, and all the time."

Harrison was elected President of the United States in the following November.

The foregoing, insofar as it had to do with the conference in the hotel room, was related to me by the late John W. Simpson, who was in the room at the time, a man of keenest discernment and emphatically of the opinion that Reed, but for the loyalties of his make-up, could have had the nomination for President in 1888 and would have been elected.

Again in 1896 Reed, then Speaker of the House, was prominently mentioned for the Presidency, standing second to William McKinley in the balloting at the national convention of his party.

But he passed up his real opportunity by a decision rendered in the early morning hours of Monday, June 25, 1888, a day on which he could have been nominated for President of the United States by a party that was subsequently victorious in the November election. Or shall I say that he accepted an opportunity in those early morning hours to make imperishable his position among the really great?

Following Mr. Redman's remarks the chapel choir sang Discovery, by Grieg, the solo part being taken by Thomas A. Brownell, of the junior class. Hon. RALPH O. BREWSTER, of the Bowdoin class of 1909, was next introduced to speak, as follows:

Second only to the Presidency in power is the justified characterization of the Speaker of the House. No small part of that preeminent position is properly attributable to the service of Thomas Brackett Reed.

In the galaxy of American political statesmen "too great for the Presidency," Reed stands upon the heights.

Reed found the House sunk in the morass of minority control—a "government of the people" paralyzed by the whim of a willful few.

Reed brought order out of the reconstruction chaos and vindicated representative democracy by virtue of his iron will. He enabled a majority to govern and lived to see his rule adopted by the opposition when they returned to power.

The orderly procedure of the House today is in no small measure a tribute to the parliamentary genius of Thomas Brackett Reed.

Time lends luster to his career. The good that he did lives on. It is profitable, however, to remember that his life was not devoid of scars.

In his first contest for the Speakership his biographer reminds us that "From the most powerful political leaders of his own State, Reed could count on little support."

Yet he triumphantly won the Speakership for the little State of Maine over William McKinley, of Ohio, and Joseph Cannon, of Illinois. Here was, indeed, a tribute to his leadership in a forum of which Garfield said, "There is no place where a man finds his true level so certainly and so speedily."

Today Reed's vision seems likely to be vindicated as the United States retires from the Philippines. His concept of America could not embrace a colonial empire far across the seas.

Saddened and embittered by the disillusionments of democracy, he retired from public life. Yet the orderly functioning of the House of Representatives stands as an enduring monument to his insight into parliamentary government and democratic processes.

America is a better place because Tom Reed lived and served. Maine and Bowdoin may well be proud that they have been privileged to train and contribute so great a figure to American public life. His career may properly inspire many another American youth in humble circumstances to recognize the power of principle in the daily walks of life.

Mr. BREWSTER's remarks were followed by the presentation of me as of the Bowdoin class of 1917, and occupying the seat in Congress once held by Congressman Reed. My remarks were as follows:

President Sills, undergraduates of Bowdoin, and ladies and gentlemen, with extreme humility and with a deep sense of the complete inadequacy of words to express in any worthy manner a fitting tribute to the memory of Thomas Brackett Reed, I approach the responsibility of participating even in a small way in this program today. A man who was a great patriot, an unexcelled statesman, and an American of the highest possible type really needs no extended verbiage to extol his works or his memory. But it is especially worthy for us today, in the light of world and domestic conditions, to pause and in the passing flight of time record again the character and genius of this noted man.

Today all over the world parliamentary and legislative processes and principles of government are on trial. Man is denying to man the fundamental and basic rights of liberty, freedom, and justice. Nations are denying to nations similar rights. As we look back upon the life of Thomas Brackett Reed we realize that his example shines for us like a star. We realize that his integrity, his honesty of purpose, his morality, and his strength of conviction indicate for us a true illustration of the path which men and nations today must travel if the destiny of mankind is to develop into that type of Christian civilization in which the greatest good is to be the order for the greatest number. Tom Reed was honest and upright in all his dealings with his fellow man. Never was his strong position nor his great power as Speaker of the House of Representatives used for his personal gain. Never did he strike a single mighty blow on any side but the right. When he did strike he was always felt. In Reed the cause of right had a champion of champions. Maine, America, and the entire world will find in the life of this man the ultimate of those qualities and those characteristics so sadly needed in the public life of this modern civilization. Today we need leaders, leaders who in thought and action will make sincerity of purpose their beacon light. This man whose birth we commemorate here today based every act on the fundamental truth that lack of sincerity is the basest and most reprehensible of all failings of mankind.

At the time when memorial services were being held for him in the Hall of Representatives in Augusta on Wednesday, January 28, 1903, Hon. Harold M. Sewall, then representative to the State legislature from Bath, said: "Reed hastened the coming of another day, a day when public service shall be emancipated from the stigma too often attaching to it, the stigma of selfishness, of unworthy motives, and corrupt methods. * * * It shall be a day of intrepidity of intellect." Then again, at these same services we find these words of Hon. Forrest Goodwin, senator from Somerset County: "Mr. Reed was a kind and a lovable man; genial and generous, sympathetic and loyal. * * * He was intensely independent, absolutely self-reliant. Brave and courageous, he never weakened in the face of opposition. He was honest and he was incorruptible."

Having scanned with some care the record of Reed's character and his life, it is my considered judgment that a Reed of today would deprecate in the strongest language applicable the injustices now existing in the family of nations; that he would call a spade a spade in the most forceful words at his command, in connection with our domestic problems; that he would be partisan, but would temper that partisanship with the sense of justice which was so inherently a part of his make-up.

To me a study of Reed's life indicated a complete abhorrence for that type of status quo which entailed a stoppage of justice, fairness, and equal opportunity for the large majority of the people of this Nation of ours. Certainly he would not tolerate parliamentary status quo and by the same token I cannot conceive of him enduring a type of economic status quo which entails a continuing unemployment paradox in a land where there is such great need for work. Is it conceivable that such a man, believing in the extension of right and justice to all, would long endure without strong protest the continuing existence of a financial status quo which hangs a burden of debt and a load of economic uncertainty and insecurity over millions of our people? Most assuredly his disdain for party pressure toward a course against his better judgment would impel him to a position of leadership against that status quo rather than an abject continuing along the road of the past just because it was the past. Tom Reeds are needed today as never before in the history of this country. New problems require new answers and men who merely approach the type of Reed must not and will not long endure these continuing conditions which deny—I repeat, which deny the fundamental and basic rights of liberty, freedom, and justice, both civil and economic.

As long as parliamentary and legislative assemblies convene in this country may we never let the life and memory of Thomas Brackett Reed become in the least forgotten or tarnished. Let the youth of today and tomorrow read and study the character and the works of this great man, a true Christian and a great American.

The exercises were closed by the singing of Beethoven's The Heavens Proclaim Him by the chapel choir and by the general singing of The Star-Spangled Banner.

Preparedness

OF

HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

ADDRESS OF HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER, OF MAINE

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address I delivered at the laying of the cornerstone of the post office at Dexter, Maine, on Saturday, October 21, 1939:

In 5 years five post offices have been built here in eastern Maine. Numerous schoolhouses have been built with the aid of Federal funds. These structures represent preparedness for the expanding pursuits of peace.

Now America must turn to a proper preparedness for defense. This does not mean any more adventures overseas in either Europe or Asia but an adequate preparation to defend the Americas.

Hangars and airplanes and mechanically trained youth are the products to which America must now turn its genius.

The work-experience schools at Eastport and at Dexter—developing mechanical aptitudes in nearly 600 young men—are rapidly being recognized as models for youth training throughout the United States.

Poland shocked the world into a realization that today military activity is almost entirely mechanized.

Yet most American mechanics are not of military age. In two decades craft training for American boys has been almost negligible. Apprenticeship is largely a forgotten job.

The assembly line and the very perfection of modern motors under peacetime conditions on our rapidly improving highways has, curiously enough, reduced the call for mechanical aptitude.

Motorized military units, however, on land or sea or in the air, call once again for Yankee skill. Garages are not just around the corner when an army is in the field. An enemy also is likely as not to leave the beaten path.

Henry Ford recently pronounced New England the greatest reservoir of mechanical genius the world had ever known. This means that New England in the next decade will once again come into its own. Maine boys and Maine industries will find their great opportunity in an America that is once again upon the march.

Our domestic difficulties may rapidly be solved by what all will agree is worth-while work in preparing America for any trouble in an increasingly troubled world.

All the alphabetical agencies may be coordinated this winter for American defense. Integration is the order of the democratic day.

Meanwhile the financial problems of the Federal Government may be solved by the resultant revival of business activity and by a willingness on the part of all patriotic Americans to bear their proper share.

Let us always remember that a sound domestic economy is the cornerstone of any national structure that shall have enduring strength.

OF

HON. GUY L. MOSER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, supplementing my remarks in the Committee of the Whole on June 29 last, I desire to make the following observations:

This is the year of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Government of the United States of America. During the initial 146 years of its existence, our Government managed to get along without any neutrality act and remain neutral in other people's controversies, and declaring war according to international law only when the people of our Nation demanded it.

Delivering his second inaugural address in 1793, President Washington said the world was "in an uproar," and the difficult task of the United States was "to steer safely between Scylla and Charybdis." Recognizing perpetual peace could never come while the spirit of injustice remained, he solemnly warned his Nation "not to indulge in a persuasion that, contrary to the order of human events, they will forever keep at a distance those painful appeals to arms and with which the history of every nation abounds." He solemnly added:

There is a rank due the United States among nations which will be withheld, if not absolutely lost, by the reputation for weakness. If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war.

Speaking "as an old and affectionate friend," Washington, in his Farewell Address, not to his generation alone but to all that were to follow in the tide of time, advised his people not to implicate themselves "in the ordinary vicissitudes of European politics of the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships and her enmities" and "against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens, the jealousies of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government."

In his first inaugural address, President Jefferson proclaimed: "Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political; peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none."

Mr. Speaker, with these landmarks and traditions passed to posterity by our Founding Fathers, this generation of Americans in its rendezvous with destiny, through its Representatives in Congress, enacted in 1935 the present Neutrality Act. The President of the United States on September 21 last came before the Congress and said: "I regret that the Congress passed that act. I regret equally that I signed that act."

Mr. Speaker, though that act was passed and approved before the honor of becoming a Member of the Congress was bestowed upon me by my constituency, I have never liked the present Neutrality Act and have publicly stated that I would vote to repeal it. I was glad to learn the President and myself are in agreement, for after following the forewarning of Washington, and the fundamental democratic philosophy of Jefferson for 146 years, the last 16 years of which were devoted to tie our Nation into the League of Nations, or its back-door entrance through the World Court, without alliances we entangled ourselves to the degree of mandating our President to do by proclamation of embargo exactly what the League of Nations has been privileged to do by agreement on economic sanctions. These are the entangling alliances of this generation of Americans' rendezvous with destiny. To undo the mischief as far as possible, and practicable under present existing circumstances, in keeping with the President's regret vouchsafed for the Congress and equally for himself, is our present problem.

The resolution before the Congress is a commitment on the part of the American people to Europeans and Asiatics that we are definitely determined to remain noncombatants in their wars, and that the Allied Governments must understand clearly and definitely that the United States will send them neither men, ships, nor credit. They dare not count on any more supplies than they can pay for out of their own funds and carry away in their own ships manned by their own crews and without Americans as passengers to entangle our Nation in buttressing claims in the event of casualties.

Mr. Speaker, because this resolution is so much more in keeping with the landmarks and traditions left to posterity by our Founding Fathers and so much more American than our position prior to the World War, and is such a decided improvement over the Neutrality Act of 1935, it wins my support.

Will Propaganda Lead Us to War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, it is true that Congress, under the Constitution, must declare war, but one cannot be blind to the fact that the exercise of this power by Congress is greatly influenced by forces which might bring Congress to a set of circumstances or into a situation that would find Congress with no honorable alternative but to declare war.

Senator SHIPSTEAD, in a statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 3, 1939, alleges that this country has engaged in various wars without a declaration of Congress:

> We made war on Mexico in 1916. We took Veracruz. We invaded Mexico with an army without a declaration of war by Congress.
> We made war on Russia in 1918 without a declaration of war by Congress and without even a proclamation by the President. We conducted that war for more than a year after the signing of the Armistice growing out of the World War.
> Together with the British Navy, we bombarded Nanking, I think, in 1926.
> We took charge of Haiti without a declaration of war, conducted war there, and took charge of the Government for many years.
> We did the same thing in Nicaragua.
> We did the same thing in the Dominican Republic without a declaration of war by Congress.

Senator NYE, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 3, 1939, shows how propaganda was used with telling effect prior to the last war in order to get the United States into it. The Right Honorable Sir Gilbert Parker, baronet, in an article in Harper's magazine for March 1918, states his propaganda activities in America practically from the day war broke out between England and Germany. Publicity was given in favor of the English cause in the following manner:

First. A weekly report to the British Cabinet on the state of American opinion.

Second. Constant touch with the permanent correspondents of American newspapers in England.

Third. Arrangements for important public men in England to act for England by interviews in American newspapers. Examples: Lloyd George, Viscount Grey, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Bonar Law, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Sir Edward Carson, Lord Robert Cecil, Walter Runciman, Austen Chamberlain, Lord Cromer, Will Crooks, Lord Curzon, Lord Gladstone, Lord Haldane, Henry James, John Redmond, Mr. Selfridge, Mr. Zangwill, Mrs. Humphrey Ward, "and fully a hundred others."

Fourth. Supplying 360 newspapers in the smaller States in the United States with an English newspaper.

Fifth. Establishing a connection with the man in the street through the cinema, through interviews, articles, pamphlets.

Sixth. Individual replies to American critics printed in the chief newspaper of the State in which they lived and copies in newspapers of neighboring States.

Seventh. Advising and stimulating people to write articles.

Eighth. Utilizing the friendly services and assistance of confidential friends.

Ninth. Receiving reports from important Americans.

Tenth. Establishing associations.

Eleventh. Personal correspondence with influential and eminent people of every profession, beginning with university and college presidents, professors, and scientific men, and running through all the ranges of population.

Twelfth. Arranging for speeches, debates, and lectures by American citizens, and supplying public libraries, Y. M. C. A. societies, universities, colleges, historical societies, clubs, and newspapers with literature.

Similar propaganda to that has now been unloosed in this country. Already many British speakers are on a lecture tour in the United States. Is it any wonder that some of us worry about what the consequences might be?

It is stated that there is only one copy in the United States of a book entitled "Propaganda in the Next War," written by one Sidney Rogerson; this is one volume in a series entitled "The Next War," edited by Capt. Liddell Hart. It was intended to be a handbook for British propaganda and was not to reach the American public. Another book, entitled "Falsehood in Wartime," by Arthur Ponsonby, M. P., shows the lying campaigns of propaganda calculated to inflame a people to war.

Congress is made up of 531 human beings, subject to the same emotional appeals as are any other human beings in the world. The power of suggestion, the influence of hatred, childhood antipathies, and other emotions disturb their logical thought processes. Their minds become inflamed as do those of others. They are swayed by subtle, insidious propaganda, by lies, error, and falsehoods, as are other Americans. That is the danger.

Our foreign policy has recently been changed from one close to isolation to one which brings us nearer the conflagration in Europe, and one which will lead us as close to the fire as possible without being burned; we are tending toward the adoption of methods short of war.

We are walking a dangerous road. We have taken footsteps which parallel the first fatal footsteps along the road which led this country into the World War. We can and must stay out of the present war. We can do so by steeling ourselves against that propaganda which tends to lead us into war. All Americans must make it their sacred duty to talk peace, disregard vicious propaganda, and keep this country out of war.

How Reciprocal-Trade Agreements Hurt Midwestern Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, in the Appendix of the RECORD, page 627, I answered, in part, the attacks made upon me by the gentleman from Kentucky, Congressman VINCENT, in the Appendix of the RECORD, volume 84, pages 4026 and 4120, because of my opposition to the trade-agreements program. I also included in my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, page 627, a statement from the American Good Government Society, in which they effectively refuted the attack made upon them by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINCENT], when I used some of their enlightening satistics as a part of my opposition to the trade-agreements program.

Mr. Speaker, the fallacies and sophistries indulged in by those who favor trade agreements remind me very much of the haunted woods at Westbury Manor which are described in a book recently called to my attention, Knight's Intimate Glimpses of Old Saint Mary's, published by the Lincoln Press, 994 National Press Building, Washington, D. C. Page 41 of this pleasantly written book on American history describes haunted woods in these words:

The woods are said to be unsafe for the traveler. The trees have grown extremely tall, and the woodland is very thick with undergrowth. So the sun, even at high noon, does not penetrate to the earth through the thickly massed foliage. A legend is told about the haunted woods to this effect: If a traveler is caught in these woods during a storm, the road will disappear. The stranger will become lost, and, weary from searching the way out, will eventually die from hunger and thirst. Late at night when there is no moon, the spirits are said to be out looking for victims.

EVIL SPIRITS OF TRADE AGREEMENTISM AFFLICT FARMERS

Mr. Speaker, the woods of international trade are indeed unsafe for the traveler. The tall trees of trade agreements and the thick undergrowth of false claims of their benefits have indeed prevented the healthful sun of publicity from piercing the thickly massed foliage cultivated by Secretary Hull and his assistant cultivators of good-neighbor benefits to foreigners at the expense of our own cattle raisers and farmers.

Uncle Sam has been caught in these woods during a storm of internationalism, and the road of safe and sane protection for the United States producer is fast disappearing. Undercut by the products of foreigners living on rice and rats, our own farmers will become lost, and, weary from searching the way out, as Mr. Knight put it, will be foreclosed off their own farms to eventually die from hunger and thirst, or at least from inadequate and unbalanced diets.

There was no moon of sanity shining in 1934 when the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act was put over, and ever since the spirits of the Hull program have been out looking for victims. Their looking has unfortunately been successful, and our own farmers, miners, and factory workers, having lost much of their tariff protection, have become true victims, just as did the three children who, according to the legend reported by Mr. Knight, "were gobbled up by the evil spirits of these black woods."

If the Congress will sit tight next year when the trade-agreement program comes up for renewal, the "evil spirits and black woods" of the program will sink out of sight in its own quicksands, and by Independence Day, 1940, we shall be free of the "evil spirits" of extra-constitutional trade agreementism.

INFLUENCE OF TRADE AGREEMENTS ON PRICES OF EGGS

In the Appendix of the RECORD, volume 84, page 4120, Congressman VINCENT claims mistakenly that eggs sold for more under the trade agreements than under higher tariff policies, following his same erroneous line of reasoning as in the Appendix of the RECORD, volume 84, page 4026 The statements by the American Good Government Society, which I quoted in the Appendix of the RECORD, page 628, effectively demolish Mr. VINCENT's arguments as applied to the United States as a whole, but they do not specifically refute the Vincent claims as applied to eggs and to my own State of South Dakota. I have, accordingly, asked the president of the society, Richard A. Staderman, whether the society's extensive research facilities had this additional information available. In response to my request a special supplement to their magazine has been issued, including this special data and a summary of some previous data. I quote it at this point:

[From supplement to the American Good Government Review, of Washington, D. C., November 2, 1939]

HISTORY PROVES HIGHER TARIFFS BENEFIT SOUTH DAKOTA—EGGS, LIKEWISE, FETCH BETTER PRICES

(By Richard A. Staderman, president, the American Good Government Society, Washington, D. C.)

In response to the request of the capable Congressman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] for statistics relating to his own State, we take pleasure in publishing the attached tables and discussion:

[1] With the population of the United States growing year by year, the per capita figures do not increase as rapidly as the actual ones. There are several methods of calculating national income which vary on such matters as accruals, etc. Alternative methods do not change the conclusions to be drawn, however.

Source of statistics: American Good Government Society, compiled from published data of National Industrial Conference Board, of Dr. Warren M. Persons, of National Bureau of Economic Research, and of various Federal Government departments. Data are authenticated estimates, including income both in cash and in kind; "in kind" amounted to $3,000,000,000 in 1929.

TABLE II.—Higher income from eggs when tariffs are higher

United States average price of eggs under Fordney-McCumber and Hawley-Smoot Acts, a period of higher tariffs lasting from 1923 through 1934 cents per dozen	23.8
United States average price of eggs under Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, a period of lower tariffs: Data for period Jan. 1, 1935, through June 30, 1939, or 4½ years cents per dozen	21.1
United States loss per dozen during 4½ years of reciprocal-trade agreements, Jan. 1, 1935, through June 30, 1939 cents per dozen	2.7
United States egg production during 4½ years of trade agreements, Jan. 1, 1935, through June 30, 1939 dozens	11,230,000,000
Loss to United States farm families on eggs during the 4½ years of trade agreements dollars	303,000,000
South Dakota egg production during 4½ years of trade agreements dozens	173,000,000
Loss to South Dakota farm families on eggs during the 4½ years of trade agreements dollars	4,700,000

Source of statistics: The American Good Government Society, Washington, D. C., compiled from various reports of the U. S. Department of Agriculture.

We suggest this question to reciprocal-trade advocates:

If high tariffs were unfavorable to the prosperity of our great United States, how could it have possibly happened that in two long periods of more than 7 years following a raising of tariff rates, that we should have prospered? Certainly no one can deny that a rising national income denotes a rising average prosperity.

In our study in the Appendix of the RECORD, volume 84, page 3762, we felt it was a true and equitable test to compare the 7 years, 1933 through 1939, under the present administration and its policies, with the 7 years preceding, 1926 through 1932, and the policies followed then. Both these 7-year periods included years that were better and years not so good. We did not, for example, try to compare the boom period, 1923 through 1929, with the 1933 through 1939 period, though such a comparison would have shown up the recent period to be even poorer in farmers' national incomes than shown by our study.

The tables presented by Mr. VINCENT in the Appendix of the RECORD, volume 84, pages 4027 and 4121, conveniently take the 4 best years under New Deal policies, namely 1935 through 1938, and compare them with the 4 lowest years that can be found, namely 1930 through 1933. Although 1933 was primarily a New Deal year, the justification given by Mr. VINCENT for combining it with 3 pre-New Deal years is that 1930 through 1933 represents the period under "Hawley-Smootism," as compared with the trade agreements years 1935 through 1938.

HONEST STATISTICS NEEDED

It is true that the national income and farmers' income during 1935 through 1938 was greater than 1930 through 1933. But does the Vincent comparison really prove anything? As a former teacher of statistics, I challenge the Vincent comparison on several grounds.

In the first place, the Hawley-Smoot tariff did not become law until June 18, 1930. As a practical matter, due to inventories on hand, the practical results of the tariff did not come into full operation until the end of 1930. At most, one might theoretically claim the last half of 1930 as part of the Hawley-Smoot period, though from the standpoint of honest statistics the year 1930 would have to be considered too mixed and indecisive to be an accurate Hawley-Smoot measure.

In the second place, the Vincent comparison conveniently omits 1934. This was the year the Trade Agreements Act was passed. However, no actual trade agreements were signed that year except the relatively minor Cuban one toward the end of 1934. As a practical matter, every unbiased student of the subject would admit that there were no effects of the Cuban agreement sufficient to substantially affect our national income or farmers' incomes in 1934. Therefore, it is correct to say that the Hawley-Smoot law was practically in full operation in 1934. If Hawley-Smoot were bad, then why is it that the national income rose from some $42,000,000,000 in 1933 to about $48,000,000,000 during 1934?

The two preceding points are merely negative. We show that the Vincent comparison is defective, but we still haven't explained that 2 years of lowered national income and depression followed the Hawley-Smoot Act. According to table I, we ought to expect economic prosperity to follow an increase in our tariff protection, just as followed the Dingley tariff of 1897 and the Fordney-McCumber tariff of 1922.

SPECULATION THE REAL MISCHIEF MAKER

The explanation is this: In the latter twenties we witnessed various booms, principally in the stock market. Farmers were selling their homes on Main Street and moving into big cities to watch Wall Street tickers. City workers and businessmen were spending more time in sitting in customers' rooms in brokerage offices than in acquiring more skill in their trades or in managing their productive businesses. Swindlers like the suicide Kreuger were on the loose, and many unsound houses of cards, like the Insull companies and the Hulswitt group, were destroying the real wealth of our people. Small wonder it was that smashes occurred in October and November 1929 and that severe depression followed.

With our entire financial house and economic system in chaos, no one measure could prevent a drastic liquidation and readjustment. The Hawley-Smoot Act was no exception. If we had had normal conditions, the increased tariff would have given a sound lift to our economic system and enabled us to prosper on a firmer fundamental basis of freedom from the whims of foreign politicians, foreign peons, and foreign sweatshops.

By the time the Hawley-Smoot tariff was signed in June 1930, the depression had been in full swing for over 8 months, since October 1929. By the time the results of the tariff were fully felt, the depression had been tobogganing full blast for at least a year. With these facts at hand, is there any fair-minded person who can say the Hawley-Smoot tariff caused the depression?

HAWLEY-SMOOT TARIFF SAVED SOUTH DAKOTA FROM WORSE DEPRESSION

As a practical matter, the Hawley-Smoot tariff of 1930 proved to be an unexpected blessing in preventing the depression from becoming still worse. Britain and other countries depreciated their currencies in 1931, which amounted to destroying part of our protection from the products of foreign sweatshops. The British currency depreciation worked in this way. A British merchant can make a profit if he sells an article for, say, 1 British pound sterling. When the pound was at $4.86 before 1931, this meant that if the South Dakota price of the article was $6 and our tariff $2, the article would not be imported because all the Britisher would get back would be the British equivalent of $4, or less than pound sterling needed to make a profit. The $4 equivalent would really in most cases be less than the Britisher's cost of production.

But what of this case in 1931, after Britain went off the gold basis and depreciated its currency? The pound dropped to below $3.50, and the British merchant could ship the product over here, say into South Dakota, pay the $2 duty, take the $4 and trade $3.50 of it for the pound sterling needed to cover costs and give him a normal profit. In addition, he could take the remaining 50 cents as an extra speculative profit at our expense.

Let us assume that the above is what would have happened if there had been no Hawley-Smoot tariff, but just the previous $2 tariff. Let us further assume that the Hawley-Smoot Act has raised the tariff on the hypothetical item to $3.10. After paying this $3.10 the Britisher would find that he had only $2.90 left from our $6 selling price. This $2.90 would bring him less than a pound sterling, he would not make a profit, therefore the item would not be imported to undersell a South Dakota farm or factory and perhaps cause foreclosures, thereby throwing its owners and workers out of employment. Many of the tariff raises under "Hawley-Smootism" prevented just this and so prevented the 1932 depression from being still worse, a worsening which might have endangered our very Government of, for, and by the people.

STRAIGHT THINKING REQUIRED

What has so confused the public about the trade-agreements program has been the tendency for its sponsors to point out each year a select group of commodities on which our exports may have happened to have increased. The increase may have had nothing to do with any reciprocal agreement, but it is dressed up and paraded in front of the public just the same. The drastic decline in grains exported in recent years is toned down as much as possible by proponents of the agreements.

Nevertheless, the public is awakening. What is the national income for the periods under discussion? What is the income of all the people in South Dakota for years back?

In so doing, people are using the technique of logic instead of emotion—the sort of logic advocated by Robert H. Thouless in the current book How to Think Straight, published by Simon & Schuster. "A really educated democracy, distrustful of emotional phraseology and all the rest of the stock in trade of the exploiters of crooked thinking," says Dr. Thouless on page 170, "could destroy these plagues of our civilizations—war, poverty, and crime—if it were determined that nothing should stand in the way of their removal."

The present Trade Agreements Act expires in June 1940. If the people of the United States "think straight," they will write the Senators and Congressmen who represent them in Washington that the act should be allowed to expire. In that way the dying reciprocal trade agreements program will have its corpse decently interred.

Mr. Speaker, the increased tariffs under the Dingley Act of 1897 caused the national income of all persons in the United States to rise from $15,000,000,000 in 1899 to $28,000,000,000 in 1907, and in South Dakota to rise correspondingly from $52,000,000 in 1899 to $92,000,000 in 1907. Between these same years prices of hogs, steers, wheat, corn, eggs and other farm products rose from 50 to 100 percent, as old-timers will remember.

The results were similar after tariffs were boosted under the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922. Our national income increased from $62,000,000,000 in 1922 to $83,000,000,000 in 1929, and the income of all people in South Dakota increased from $236,000,000 in 1922 to $352,000,000 in 1929. During that same period prices of beef cattle rose from $5 a hundredweight to over $9, hogs from $6 to $9 and $10. The United States average price of wheat was 96 cents a bushel for 1922; by 1925 higher tariff policies had brought this up to an average of $1.44 for 1925.

As a matter of fact, if we want to go back to the earliest days of our independence, we find that it was the period 1808 to 1816 that both farm and factory got a great boost. During that period, imports into the United States were almost stopped by various wars, and our iron-making, cotton-manufacturing, wool-making, and many other industries sprang up. With previous imports of cotton and other agricultural products cut off there was a great stimulation given to our farmers to raise the crops we needed for food or manufacturing. In 1816 the war blockades were over and imports began to flood the United States, demoralizing prices for farm and factory. Some protective tariffs were then passed, but they were not high enough, and it was only after further tariffs were enacted in the 1820's that prosperity really came back.

EMBARGO REPEAL MAY FURTHER AGGRAVATE FARM PROBLEMS

Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a final word of caution here that American farmers do not permit the present war psychosis, which has unfortunately gripped this country, to lull them into believing that the war in Europe will automatically solve our American farm problem. It is also imperative that Members of Congress realize that the European war has not obviated the need for us to work out a wise and honest farm program, because if we fail in this duty, the basic raw products of this country are going to continue to fail to bring their producers the decent income to which they are entitled. It is, therefore, as important as ever that the reciprocal-trade policies of Secretary Hull and the New Deal be terminated and that the American farmer be given an American opportunity to supply the markets of his own country at a price which will enable him once again to enjoy the American standard of living.

The repeal of the arms embargo by this special session of Congress may work an additional hardship on the American farmer, according to early reports reaching us from England. Now that the American munitions makers are once again free to solicit business from warring nations and to sell them for cash—all the supplies of guns, airplanes, poison gases, flame throwers, ammunition, and other industrial devices and mechanical contraptions for human slaughter—the American farmer may find that this industrial competition for the belligerents' dollars is so great that he can no longer export as much foodstuff, tobacco, and cotton as formerly. With only so much cash to spend, it seems logical to assume that nations at war will buy for cash primarily the means of taking the lives of their enemies and rely upon their colonies and nonmanufacturing nations to supply them with the life-preserving supplies from farm, ranch, and plantation. If such an eventuality develops, it will mean that repeal of the arms embargo was just another device for selling the farmer down the river by giving his best foreign customer to the industrialists and depriving him of that outlet for his own products, while importations of farm supplies continue to come into this country from South America and elsewhere, because of the lowered tariff protection foisted upon him by the trade pacts.

ENGLISH SAY THEY WILL NOW BUY FEWER AMERICAN FARM PRODUCTS

An early indication that the curtailment of the foreign market for American farm products will be one of the results of repeal of the arms embargo, is seen in the United Press report emanating from London on November 2, the day embargo repeal was ratified in the House. This news report stated, "A canvass of importers resulted in one estimate that British importation of American products other than war needs might drop off $150,000,000 annually." The report goes on to state that there was general agreement in England that the import of American war materials would increase but that the purchase of "non-essential industrial and agricultural products would decline."

FARM REPRESENTATIVES ALMOST 100 PERCENT AGAINST EMBARGO REPEAL

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, it might be noted in passing that the vast majority of Representatives from the farm States of the Middle West and the Northwest voted against the repeal of the arms embargo and so cannot be charged with any curtailment of foreign demand for American farm products which may follow this unique method of shifting European buying power from the sales markets of our farmers and inviting it to buy American industrial supplies such as arms and munitions instead.

An interesting revelation comes from an analysis of the way in which Representatives from the strictly farm States of America voted on the question of repealing the arms embargo. A study of the RECORD for November 2 shows that the House vote from the farm States of the West and Middle West was almost unanimous against repeal, regardless of party affiliation, and one reason frequently given was the fear that "from a purely materialistic point of view" such action would prove a boomerang rather than a boon to American agriculture. The Representatives of the 10 farm States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, South Dakota, North Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Wyoming, Idaho, and Montana, for example, voted 46 to 3 against repeal of the arms embargo. Even when adding such agricultural States as Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and Pennsylvania, which contain four of America's largest cities—whose Representatives were almost unanimous for repeal—the total vote from these four States was 70 to 38 against repeal, making the total antirepeal vote from the whole bloc of northern farm States 116 compared with 41 in favor of repeal.

It is possible that a long war in Europe might strengthen American farm prices despite the demand-increasing effects of embargo repeal, but our Government should immediately increase tariff protection for American producers to the point where they will not have to compete with foreign farmers for American markets on any products which can be raised in this country in sufficient quantities to supply domestic demands. When this happy situation is brought about we shall have taken the first big step toward restoring the agricultural prosperity which is basic to any sound and permanent national prosperity in this country.

Stuffed-Shirt Committees in the Wage-Hour Administration

OF

HON. GUY L. MOSER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, supplementing those made in the Committee of the Whole on March 28, last, I desire to take occasion to note the newest activities in the direction of influence exerted on a bureau of Government by Earl Constantine, in his caapcity as president of the National Association of Hosiery Manufacturers.

It is believed that my contest with Milo Perkins, of the Farm Security Administration, over his having entered into a contract to divert funds appropriated for farm relief under the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, to the uses of the Dexdale Hosiery Mills, of Lansdale, Pa., are rather well known.

When the matter of appropriations to Farm Security Administration was under debate in the House, as a Committee of the Whole on March 28, I discussed this racketeering very pointedly, but the limit on my time and apparent lack of necessity prompted my omission of the names of outside influence with whom Milo Perkins had been dealing. Mr. Perkins, having pointed out that he had a bear by the tail, because Resettlement Administration had effected the building of homes that became too costly under the self-help conceived idea, and the hope that industry would be attracted thereby to these communities having failed to materialize, prompted his seeking industry for these Resettlement-sponsored communities. He stated that Arthur Paul, of the Dexdale Hosiery Mills, inventor of a knitting machine that would knit a complete stocking in one operation without looping to complete the operation of knitting leg and foot on different machines, made him the initial offer. Earl Constantine visited Mr. Perkins along with Mr. Paul and in his official capacity vouchsafed the approval of the industry, and approval of the American Federation of Hosiery Workers was won through Emil Rieve and Mr. Hoffman, when the latter was tentatively engaged as technical adviser in the transplanting and establishing of the industry to the homesteads. Mr. Hoffman was left high and dry when wired at Philadelphia to be present at the Cumberland Homestead the next morning for the stated purpose and could not possibly make it.

Mr. Speaker, when the wage-hour bill was before the Congress, I signed the first discharge petition and voted against the recommittal of the bill, and when the second petition was placed on the Speaker's desk, I again signed it, again voted against the bill's recommittal, and for its passage, as it is now the law. Since the Wage-Hour Administration was set up in the Department of Labor every constituent of mine seeking endorsement for employment thereunder was given scant consideration and all were rejected. A stenographer in the employ of another bureau of the Government in Washington, qualifying by experience and within the classified civil service by the honest method of open competitive examination, was assured of assignment at Philadelphia, through my intercession and recommendation, that a separated family might be reunited, but was rejected and kept in Washington.

Mr. Speaker, in last year's general election my leading opponent was one who attacked the administration by all known propaganda. He waged a vigorous campaign to accomplish my defeat and, vaunting his own position as an educator, disparaged my humble beginning as a down-country dirt farmer. In so doing he honored, without wishing to do so, my youthful environments. In his paid advertisements he was equally personal, untruthful, and callow. His own record shows descent from the faculty of a university to a college whose training thus far has not established that its students have been able to pass the qualifying entrance examination to either the United States Military or Naval Academy at West Point, N. Y., and Annapolis, Md., and while he was advertising my lowly beginning, he neglected to point out that the college whose faculty he now has vaunted as gracing, formerly and in its most humble beginnings occupied a building now used as a chicken house. This cad and stuffed shirt is the first foe I have vanquished in an election who lacked the sportsmanship to congratulate the victor at the polls.

Mr. Speaker, imagine, if you can, my personal reaction to the appearance in an evening daily newspaper in my district, the picture of my late rival at the polls captioned "Appointed," with headlines "Professor wins recognition * * * Named on two wage and hour boards." The other, a morning newspaper published in the same city, the next morning, carried headlines "* * * Put on two more committees." These news items appeared September 29 and 30, 1939, respectively.

Mr. Speaker, on last Saturday the same morning newspaper carried first-page headlines "* * * To attend wage-hour hearing." Each press item referred to correctly embodies the knitted outerwear industry committee, where he is one of six to function as representing the public, and the knitted underwear and commercial knitting committes as one of eight to function as representing the public.

Mr. Speaker, this multifold appointee is a newcomer to my home county and district, and a carpetbagger in every sense of the term since he carried out the endeavor to become a Member of Congress. His name has been deleted, as well as the name of his college. Since the voters of my district did not see fit to put either of them into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I shall not do so.

Significant unto itself, however, the record at the Wage and Hour Division, United States Department of Labor, shows that he was recommended by Earl Constantine and a Dr. George W. Taylor, otherwise unidentified, but suspected to be another professor. It is pointed out that he has served as impartial chairman in the Reading district on questions involving collective agreements of the hosiery industry. Officials of the Wage and Hour Division assure me that the professor serves on a committee of 45 members, amounting to a stuffed-shirt aggregation and of no more relative importance from the standpoint of importance than on a committee to arrange for an inaugural ball; that no salary is attached thereto, and a per diem for expenses is only involved when the committee meets in the Capital City; but they, too, state that he must have a very good press agent at home to thus vaunt the importance of the headlines given in the press clippings they have examined in my office.

Having functioned "as impartial chairman in the Reading district on questions involving collective agreements of the hosiery industry," which won for him the support of Labor's Non-Partisan League in the last election, he has adroitly flirted with the outstanding success in having Earl Constantine, president of the National Association of Hosiery Manufacturers, recommend him for the appointments to the committees under the Wage and Hour Administration, which made possible the press headlines vaunting the importance of the recognition.

Mr. Speaker, anyone may contrast my record on the Wage and Hour Act, and battle against Farm Security Administration's generosity with funds appropriated to farm relief in diverting them to the establishment of additional hosiery mills in competition with those privately financed and already established, at the instance of the same Earl Constantine, all to the prejudice of the farmers and the thousands of hosiery workers in my district, all of whom are purchasers of the farmers' produce. This is the public record of "the down-country dirt farmer" whose defeat for reelection to Congress was sought by the stuffed-shirt professor sitting on committees to represent the public, but recommended by the president of the National Association of Hosiery Manufacturers.

World War Veterans Demand Neutrality

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, President Roosevelt called Congress into special session to deal with the "national emergency" arising from the war in Europe. When the President appeared in person to address the joint session of Congress, which convened on September 21, he asked only for revision of the Neutrality Act to meet this "national emergency."

Since that time there has been manifest an overwhelming opinion in the country that Congress should stay on the job until the regular session convenes in January to meet this "national emergency." I share the general and widespread opinion and the sound reason upon which it is based.

This sentiment for a continuation of the special session does not spring from any partisan motives. It does not come alone from those who disagree with the President on the repeal of the arms embargo. Stanch Democratic newspapers, which frequently reflect the views of the New Deal, as well as a section of public opinion, are among the strongest advocates of continuing the session until it merges with the regular session of Congress in January.

Naturally, the chief reason for this desire to have Congress remain in session is to keep this country out of the European war. No mere change in the American neutrality law can remove the dangers of our involvement in the war. On the contrary, the dangers remain, and, in the opinion of many authorities on international law, the danger of involvement will be increased by reason of the change in the law, in the midst of the war.

Unforseen emergencies, incident to the war, not only are likely to arise, but certainly will arise as the war in Europe progresses. Congress should be in session to deal with such emergencies without delay.

On the eve of the outbreak of hostilities in Europe and anticipating that eventuality, the Fortieth National Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, at Boston, Mass., August 27–September 1, 1939, ordered a telegram sent to the President, reading as follows:

> Acting upon reports of the European situation received today and having in mind the welfare of our country, the Fortieth National Encampment of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States assembled at Boston, Mass., suggests and urgently requests that you immediately call the Congress of the United States into session to convene forthwith that all branches of our constitutional government may be functioning in this time of stress and uncertainty.

Aside from the emergency arising directly from the European war, Congress should stay in session to consider the Nation's many pressing domestic problems, many of which have been complicated and aggravated by the war situation. With that in view, Otis N. Brown, the newly elected commander in chief of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, expressed his views, as follows:

> Inasmuch as there are so many issues of national importance crying for attention, and inasmuch as practically the same overhead expense will be incurred, even though Congress is not in session, as if it were to remain in session, it would seem reasonable that the people of our Nation are justified in asking Congress to continue in session for the purpose of making progress toward the solution of such matters. Moreover, the so-called national emergency incident to the present war in Europe, makes it desirable that Congress remain in session.

The American Legion, which also voices the sentiment of a complete cross section of American citizenship, expressed the view that Congress continue in session, as follows:

The American Legion views with gravest concern the apparently widespread belief that this Nation must inevitably become involved in the present European conflict. We not only believe that this Nation need not become involved, but insist and demand that the President of the United States and the Congress pursue a policy that, while preserving the sovereignty and dignity of this Nation, will prevent involvement in this conflict.

The American Legion is not a law body. It has often recommended to the Congress the enactment of legislation establishing a permanent or fixed policy on important national problems. The American Legion has always strenuously advocated that this Nation pursue a policy of neutrality and peace. In the present world crisis conditions may change so rapidly that a pronouncement by the American Legion at this time on specific legislation might be wholly inadequate in the near future.

Therefore, with full confidence in the President and the Congress, we demand that the Congress continue in session during the present grave crisis and that appropriate action be taken to preserve the peace, sovereignty, and dignity of this Nation, and that our armed forces be expanded immediately to maintain our neutrality.

An All-American Navy

OF
HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

ADDRESS BY HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER, OF MAINE

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address I delivered before Norway-South Paris Kiwanis Club October 26, 1939, at Norway, Maine:

Americans everywhere may heartily welcome the new naval program as exclusively designed for American defense. This is the significance of the emphasis on craft other than battleships.

This does not mean the battleship is done or that all possibility of carrying naval conflict across the seas is ended. But it does mean that the proposed 25-percent increase in other types than battleships and particularly the 100-percent increase in naval aircraft signifies a primary concern for the defense of the American hemisphere.

To carry naval warfare across 3,000 miles of ocean requires a 2-to-1 superiority in the aggressor. That goes both ways. All naval authorities agree there is a loss of at least 40 percent in long-distance fleet operations and the remaining 10 percent is desired as a safety factor.

This explains the 5-to-3 ratio desired to meet the Japanese in Asiatic waters.

In the rebuilding of our $5,000,000,000 fleet in the last decade prime emphasis was placed upon the battleship to what seemed to many the neglect of the destroyer and the submarine and aircraft.

Only recently the naval program was in arrears to the number of 56 destroyers and 20 submarines and it was proposed to limit naval aircraft arbitrarily to 3,000.

The new naval program would indicate that strenuous efforts would now be made to overcome these shortages and to increase these types by from 25 percent to 100 percent.

This incidentally means much to Maine. This program should practically guarantee full steam ahead at Kittery and Bath for the next decade, although Maine has never conceived of national defense in terms of private gain.

The stress upon the battleship, whose cost is now approaching $100,000,000, led many to fear the Navy was being developed primarily for overseas warfare in either European or Asiatic waters. Some years ago some of us in Congress protested vigorously against the United States becoming involved in war as a result of American trade being carried on in war zones.

That was the chief cause of our involvement in 1917. The loss of American lives and American ships in the war zones inflamed American opinion. Today that is no longer possible. Such commerce is forbidden in the law just passed.

The almost irreparable injury to the American merchant marine through the recent neutrality legislation is sufficient answer to the suggestion of Communist Commissar Molotov that this act was "simply a mask to cover our struggle for profit."

America has weighed in the balance the freedom of the seven seas and the sacrifice of American boys in defense of this century-old doctrine and has decided in favor of American youth.

No more convincing indication can be found of this reorientation of American policy than in the character of the billion-dollar addition that is proposed to the American Navy. Every line breathes the spirit of an adequate defense—and nothing more.

We must realize that this will give us a $6,000,000,000 navy. The operation and maintenance and replacement of such a naval establishment must exceed a billion dollars a year. Yet America is ready to pay billions for defense, but not one cent for tribute to involvement in any foreign wars.

This means, however, that to support this burden America must put its domestic house in order. Sound national finances are the backbone of any adequate defense. Germany is far more likely to be beaten by an internal break-down of its economy than by any foreign foe. Commissar Molotov would desire nothing more than disorder and chaos in our domestic economy as a prelude to his approaching call to revolution.

This naval program involves no final conclusion upon the argument between the battleship and the airplane and submarine. We shall still have a battle line equal to any in the world. Yet it is obvious that events cast their shadow. Everyone in America has undoubtedly heard of the sinking of the Royal Oak by a submarine. A proposal to add 3,000 aircraft to our naval forces and not to add any more battleships to existing authorizations at this time indicates a most gratifying change of policy and opinion. Incidentally 3,000 aircraft will cost little more than one modern battleship.

The proposal to add 40 destroyers and 16 submarines guarantees further the defensive purpose of this proposal by Chairman VINSON and the Navy Department. Commerce raiders of any character can be cared for within this authorization in this hemisphere.

The new naval program is one of the most reassuring developments in a decade to all those millions of Americans who are determined to see America kept out of war.

Assistance for Distressed Farmers

OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago I introduced a joint resolution asking for an appropriation to aid the distressed farmers in the rain- and flood-stricken areas in north Mississippi and northwestern Alabama.

I pointed out at the time that crop conditions in that section were the worst they had been in a hundred years, due to conditions over which the people had no control.

I have before me the ginners' report showing the number of bales of cotton ginned in each county in the district which I represent prior to October 18, 1938, and also the number of bales ginned in each county prior to October 18, 1939. The figures are as follows:

County	Number bales ginned prior to Oct. 18, 1938	Number bales ginned prior to Oct. 18, 1939
Alcorn	9,750	2,564
Clay	8,035	2,501
Itawamba	7,563	3,145
Lee	22,198	7,792
Lowndes	12,306	6,632
Monroe	19,974	11,959
Noxubee	12,292	7,734
Oktibbeha	4,603	1,442
Prentiss	8,449	2,260
Tishomingo	6,769	3,070

Thus it will be seen that the average for 1939 is about one-third of a normal crop; whereas the expense of making it was even greater than that of 1938, for the reason that many farmers planted several times and invariably bought fertilizer each time.

The corn crop was even shorter than the cotton crop. It is estimated that throughout the district the corn crop will not average more than 20 percent of a normal yield.

I give you these facts to let the Congress and the country know that in pressing my demands for assistance for these distressed farmers I was actuated by a condition the like of which the people in that section have never seen before.

I was asked by the leaders not to press this question on the floor, for the reason that this session of Congress was convened to consider changes in our neutrality laws. I pointed out to them, and to the Members of the House, that while I did not want to interfere with the administration's program I considered the condition of the people in these distressed areas just as serious as if they were themselves engaged in a war.

Other Members who had flood or drought disasters in their respective districts joined me and we appealed to every department of the Government that even had the power to offer assistance, with the result that arrangements have finally been worked out to take care of the situation.

Four Federal agencies have completed a joint plan for meeting drought and flood emergencies which have affected more than 115,000 farm families in 34 States. The plan was drafted at the request of the President after consultation with us Members from the stricken areas.

Loans, direct relief, and emergency food supplies will be provided for these needy families by the Farm Security Administration, the Farm Credit Administration, the Disaster Loan Corporation, and the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, beginning immediately. Funds of the first three agencies available for emergency use total $33,500,000. In addition, Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation expects to increase considerably its shipments of surplus foodstuffs into the distressed areas.

The Farm Security Administration has available $8,500,000 for emergency rehabilitation loans and direct relief to farm families which cannot obtain adequate help from any other source.

The Farm Credit Administration will provide up to $20,000,000 for emergency crop and feed loans to farmers who can give a first lien on their crops or livestock. Security of this type is required by the law governing Farm Credit Administration operations.

The Disaster Loan Corporation has available not more than $5,000,000 for loans to eligible farm borrowers in those counties in Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, and Tennessee which have been stricken by floods during recent months, as were large numbers of farmers in every county in my district. Legal limitations restrict its operations to the flood area. The other agencies, however, are free to operate in both flood and drought regions.

As the need develops, the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation will increase its shipments of surplus foodstuffs to drought and flood States for distribution through the public welfare departments to supplement other forms of aid.

Farm families needing the services offered by any of the four agencies may apply to the county offices of the Farm Security Administration or the Farm Credit Administration crop and feed loan offices, or may obtain information from County Agricultural agents. Applications then will be routed to the proper agency for immediate action.

The Disaster Loan Corporation is arranging to send examiners into the flood area and will open an office in Montgomery, Ala., for the review of loan applications. Its present offices in Birmingham, Ala., Little Rock, Ark., Nashville, Tenn., and Jacksonville, Fla., also will assist in this work.

This, together with the various work-relief projects that have been released within the last few weeks, will aid greatly in carrying these people through the winter months. If it is not sufficient to meet the demands, then I shall renew my request for the passage of adequate legislation when Congress convenes in January.

Our first duty is to the people we represent, and especially when it comes to dealing with a disaster of this kind, with which they have been overwhelmed as a result of conditions over which they have no control.

I am sure that if every Member of the House understood this situation, as many of you are bound to understand it, they would realize that I was amply justified in pressing this claim for assistance for the distressed farmers of the district I have the honor to represent as well as for the distressed farmers in other stricken areas throughout the Nation.

This is an agricultural country. When the farmers fail or when agricultural prices sink below the cost of production, the entire Nation suffers. Therefore when such conditions prevail it is perfectly right and proper for the Federal Government to come to the assistance of those farmers who, as a result of no fault of their own, find themselves the victims of a disaster of this kind.

I have done my best to secure assistance for them, regardless of the protests from certain Members who were more interested in the affairs of Europe than they were in the welfare of these distressed farmers, and I have no apologies for it. Under similar circumstances I would do the same thing again.

The Money Question

OF

HON. LYNN J. FRAZIER

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article on the money question.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

The following is a statement attributed to Salmon P. Chase, the Secretary of the Treasury under President Lincoln:

> My agency in procuring the passage of the National Bank Act was the greatest financial mistake of my life. It has built up a monopoly that affects every interest in the country. It should be repealed. But before this can be accomplished, the people will be arrayed on one side and the banks on the other in a contest such as we have never seen before in this country.

If that was true just after the Civil War, it is doubly so when we speak about the Federal Reserve System at the present time. The trouble with our monetary system is that there is not a proper distribution of money so that people can buy the necessities of life. Thus we now have too much to eat and wear, and, at the same time, we have from ten to twelve million persons without money to buy these products which they need. The Government is supposed to be run for the benefit of all of the people. The issuance of money is one of the Government's most important functions. Money is the lifeblood of trade. Without it, there can be families in actual want because the wage earner cannot get a job, and, at the same time, there may be bumper crops and an abundance of manufactured products throughout the Nation.

The reason for this strange paradox is the turning over by the Government of the issuing and control of its money to the privately owned Federal Reserve banking systems. Being privately owned, they are run for a profit and it behooves them to see that there is a scarcity of money in circulation because then there is more of a demand for it and they can collect higher rates of interest for it. Money is supposed to be a medium of exchange, but the bankers have turned it into a commodity in which they can deal and make a profit at the expense of the public who really own or should own the money in the first place.

The Government prints and coins our money. The only reason that it has any value is that the Government says that it has a certain value, and that the taxing power of the Government is back of it. Any piece of money is merely a promise to pay made by the Government. This money is put into circulation, however, not for the use of the public but for the use of the bankers.

Does the Government charge any interest on the money they hand over the bankers? Not at all. The bankers pay for the actual cost of the paper and the printing. The average cost of paper money is approximately 30 cents per thousand dollars. The bankers then loan the people the Government money. And if the Government does not collect enough in taxes to pay running expenses, tax-exempt, interest-bearing bonds are issued and sold to these same bankers, who, on buying them, thus loan the Government some of the money which was turned over to them free. The banks, in turn, deposit the Government bonds as collateral and receive their par value in new Government money—with which to buy more Government bonds.

There are a great number of people in the United States who believe that we will never have permanent prosperity until the control of our money and credit is taken out of the hands of the financial interests. There is wide difference of opinion, however, on the best way to accomplish this end. In an effort to unite the many monetary reformers so that something can be accomplished through a united front, the following resolution was introduced, first, by Congressman BURDICK, of North Dakota, and in its present form by Congressman VOORHIS of California and myself. We feel that most of the monetary reformists will agree that this is a step in the right direction. If passed, it will require Congress to use its constitutional prerogatives of coining money and regulating the value thereof.

Hearings will be held by the committee provided for by this resolution, and every plan will be heard before a final decision is made. Every group will have a chance to present its plan to the committee. This will be fair to everyone having a monetary theory, and all will have a chance to be heard.

To show that the monetary-minded can and will unite on this, I am submitting two letters from the many encouraging words I have received since the introduction of Senate Joint Resolution 188. From the office of Money, the only newspaper in the United States devoted exclusively to the money issue, located at 280 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y., I have received this letter:

DEAR SENATOR: I wish to thank you for the part you are playing to get all monetary reformers to unite in abolishing the Federal Reserve System's unconstitutional privilege of issuing money.

The following organizations have written us they will back you up in the fight: Capture Congress Committee, American Women's Civil League of Manhattan, Salem (Oreg.) Money Club, Better World Foundation, Boston New Economics Group, Dollar-an-Hour Club, New York New Economics Group, Perry County (Ind.) Money Club, Crusaders for Economic Liberty, National Reform Associates.

We have received word from many large organizations that they will submit it to their membership for endorsement with the hope there will be no dissention. We will do all in our power to assist you.

Very truly,

(Signed) JOHN G. SCOTT, Editor.

Mr. FRAZIER. The following letter was received from the Dollar-an-Hour Club, a national organization advocating labor-hour-wealth money, located at 53 C Street SE., Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SENATOR: Our National Board of Control has unanimously voted to support Senate Joint Resolution 188 and House Joint Resolution 391. We believe you have, by the introduction of this measure, done more to unite the monetary reformers of the Nation and lead a real battle against money merchants than anything else which has happened in 75 years. We will do everything in our power to aid in getting congressional support.

Very truly,

(Signed) E. W. MASON,
Chairman, National Board of Control.

Senate Joint Resolution 188, as introduced, reads as follows:

Joint resolution to restore to Congress the sole power to issue money and regulate the value thereof

Whereas the national banks of the United States from and since 1863 have been operating contrary to the provisions of the Federal Constitution; and

Whereas the Federal Reserve System has, since 1913, been operating contrary to the provisions of the Federal Constitution, and that both of the aforesaid institutions have unconstitutionally used the power of Congress to issue and regulate the value of money contrary to the Constitution; and

Whereas the constitutional provision referred to is section 8 of article I, which reads as follows: "The Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures"; and

Whereas said constitutional provision has never been modified, amended, or repealed: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That said national banks and said Federal Reserve Board, and the member banks of the Federal Reserve System, be, and they are hereby, declared to be operating without any constitutional authority; be it further

Resolved, That said institutions and each of them shall not, after 18 months from the passage of this resolution, be permitted to issue any money or have any control over any of the money and credits of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That if said institutions, or either of them, obtain credit from the Government of the United States, it shall be on the same terms and conditions as the credits extended by the Government to other institutions and individuals; and be it further

Resolved, That a joint committee of both Houses of Congress be appointed to formulate a plan to be presented to Congress for the future regulation of money.

Tanks Over Poland

OF

HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SPEECH BY HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER, OF MAINE

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech I delivered before campaign meeting of Model Government League of National Youth Administration School at "Quoddy" village, Eastport, Maine, preliminary to model city elections in self-government on Thursday evening, October 5, 1939:

Twenty years without apprentices have tremendously weakened the industrial backbone of America in this era of increasing mechanization. Stop and think how many boys in any town in Maine have learned a trade in the last two decades.

Bath and Kittery are now a market for all the competent mechanics we can produce. Bath has prudently undertaken to train boys with an industrial background to supply its needs. On my desk was a call from the Boston Navy Yard for boys with 4 years of mechanical training. A week later came a notice that 2 years would be accepted as shortages pressed.

Suddenly the world realizes that all defense is now mechanized—on the sea, in the air, and, as poor Poland shows, on the land.

The automobile-assembly lines and prefabricated houses seemed at first to indicate the day of the skilled artisan had passed. Now, peace as well as war evidently requires more and more industrial skill.

The Poles were as helpless before the mechanized divisions of the German Army as the Mexicans before Cortez.

As America moves this winter into a program of more adequate preparedness on land and sea and air, the first shortage will be found in the trained mechanics that are required to make the modern military machine anything but a sorry joke.

A sandlot ball team might as well try to play the Yankees as to pit the heroes of Bunker Hill against a modern tank.

Today here at "Quoddy" 400 boys are determining their preliminary aptitudes for industrial training. At Dexter 100 N. Y. A. boys, drawn from all over Maine, are working alongside 150 mechanics in the foundry, at the lathes, and in the drafting rooms. From these schools must be recruited the boys that Maine will soon very urgently require to supply the demand for artisans in shop and field as American preparedness for peace or war gets fully under way.

Has Congress Abdicated Its Solemn Responsibilities?

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I was one of those who voted today against the resolution which adjourned Congress sine die.

I did so because I have a very firm conviction that Congress ought to remain at its post of duty and share with the Chief Executive the responsibility for keeping this country out of war.

This is not a new idea on my part, as the RECORD will show. On May 8, 1939, during the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 22, which reads as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress shall adjourn on January 2, 1940.

If Congress had adopted the resolution I offered last May, it would not have been necessary for the President to call an extra session, as the national lawmaking body would have remained in continuous session. It costs about three-quarters of a million dollars to hold an extra session of Congress—in mileage and other expenses. If my resolution had been adopted, that money would have been saved to the taxpayers.

And if my resolution had been adopted, the people of America would now feel the security that would come from having Congress in session during the 2 months that will intervene before the next regular session will begin. With the world aflame and kaleidoscopic changes taking place in international relations every day, almost anything may happen during the next 2 months.

The Constitution of the United States vests the war-making machinery in the lawmaking branch. With the world on fire, Capitol Hill is deserted. It is a tragic thought that at a time like this Congress is shirking its solemn responsibilities.

Projected Kidnaping of a Member of Congress By W. P. A. Workers and Workers Alliance Members

OF

HON. GUY L. MOSER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD to supplement those made in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union Friday, June 16, 1939, I desire to submit the following:

When sworn testimony supported by affidavits was submitted to the W. P. A. Subcommittee on Appropriations May 11, 1939, disclosing the plotting of my projected kidnaping if I returned home to attend the cornerstone laying at the new post-office and Federal building in Reading, Pa., May 13, no Member of Congress could have been more amazed than myself. That same afternoon of May 11 when radio broadcasters, on into the night continued to announce it on Nation-wide hook-ups, my amazement turned to astonishment that such bold and rash procedure could have been plotted in my home and native county, which sent its representative to the First Continental Congress and has continued to be represented at the seat of National Government ever since that initial step. Four of the county's native sons had signed the Constitution of the United States, and of the First Congress, four Members had been born in the county and immediately adjacent thereto when native parents sojourned over the county line.

Most amazing of all was the disintegration of this traditionally patriotic background to a degree when a deserter from the Loyalist Army in Spain could boldly enter and in his communistic environs, as blatantly, as rashly advocate the kidnaping of the Congressman for refusal to bow to the Workers Alliance's mandates and blackmailing threats of being held personally responsible if the Congressman did not vote for the appropriation of the taxpayers' money as these racketeers and rowdies demanded.

The manner in which the press of the Nation took this matter up by publishing the account and commenting editorially clearly indicated the editors of the country felt the Nation's pulse in this situation. Summarizing, some of these, selected at random, are listed as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the press in Reading, Harrisburg, York, Lancaster, Camden, Trenton, Newark, Norristown, Allentown, and Pottsville, covering areas near my district as well as many other parts of the Nation similarly abounded with comment on this plotting by Communists among W. P. A. workers to resort to physical violence if necessary to prevent my appearance on the platform to speak on the occasion of the cornerstone laying at the new post office in Reading, Pa. This plotting followed closely the threat by persons registered as Communist voters as well as of other parties on dodgers sent by mail and constituting blackmail under the statutes, reading as follows:

Mr. Congressman, either you support request for an additional $150,000,000 for W. P. A. or I will hold you personally responsible if W. P. A. workers are laid off; if unemployment increases, which means more taxes for relief; if business suffers and recovery is crippled in the district you represent.

Fill out the above form. Mail it immediately to your Congressman and our Senators in Washington, D. C.

WORKERS ALLIANCE OF BERKS COUNTY,
Collective Bargaining Agency for Unemployed and W. P. A. Workers, 11 North Eighth Street, Reading, Pa.

Reading, Laureldale, Birdsboro, New Jerusalem, and Kutztown.

Knowing that all appropriations have been ample and that not one single regularly sponsored application has been turned down or rejected on account of insufficient funds available, and that the excessive appropriations have been conducive to the extravagances, wanton and wasteful practices and expenditures in violation of existing law, rules, and regulations, I refused to be bulldosed or intimidated and voted with the Committee on Appropriations on its recommendations and findings. The foregoing enumeration herein set forth can therefore only be construed as one reprisal that can properly be laid to the Workers Alliance, aptly set forth in the uninspired but well-chosen headlining in the New York Times, Reprisal Threat Laid to Alliance.

There are indications and reverberations that their reprisals are to be carried into the next election. Whether this be effected or not, I shall follow the trail blazed by the illustrious men who preceded men from the First Continental Congress, through the founding of our Government, on down through the level of time to the present one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the launching of the First Congress under the Constitution into the present Seventy-sixth Congress.

OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SPEECH OF HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER, OF MAINE

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech I delivered at the banquet of the Bangor Masonic Club in honor of Hon. William M. Brown, president of the National League of Masonic Clubs, and Arvid V. Swaningson, past president of the National League of Masonic Clubs, Saturday evening at 6:30 o'clock, October 21, 1939, at Bangor, Maine:

Religious undernourishment is at the root of our social and economic ills. The world is starved for God. Too many churches have been closed in America as well as Russia by the indifference of a people who do not choose to go.

Order will emerge from the current chaos as individuals submit themselves once again to the guidance of an Almighty God—a God that is neither Aryan nor pagan—a God that embraces all humanity, including Slav and Teuton, in one great brotherhood.

Let us keep always in mind that Tolstoi and Luther were products of Russia and Germany as well as Stalin and Hitler.

America is an alloy of all races and religions. Atheism alone has never found here a fertile soil. In the crucible of this world convulsion America may be melted and then beaten into a metal that may be stronger than any the world has ever known.

Like the Crusaders of old, Americans must first purge themselves of every selfish thought. Then they will be ready to serve in meekness and yet in might as an example for the salvation of a weary, struggling world.

America is gathering its resources to be ready to fill an ever greater role. Domestic peace and substantial unity of thought and action are essential before we can speak wisely to the world.

An America properly prepared, spiritually and materially, may lay the foundation for a new world order in which old things shall pass away.

Soon we shall recognize that God alone can guide America in the maelstrom of this new day.

A new golden age for America and humanity may emerge from this terrific holocaust if Americans everywhere shall live worthily of the heritage that is so obviously ours.

Run-Around the Government Departments Give to Inquirers

OF
HON. GUY L. MOSER
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, November 2, 1939

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I take occasion to recount an experience I had in calling one of the great Departments of our great Government on the telephone from the House cloak room yesterday afternoon, November 1, 1939. I called and obtained the Bureau desired, asked for the branch of the Bureau wanted, and obtained it. I was then switched from that to 3 different extensions and answered by as many persons, each of whom referred me to the next extension. I was then on the fifth turn right back with the first extension, namely, 300, which I had originally obtained on getting the desired Bureau. This was after in each instance mentioning my identity and official purpose. I gave this last person a lecture on the vaunted efficiency of the Department, and succeeded in having my wants accepted, whereupon the information sought was obtained and telephoned to my secretary in my office while I remained on the floor of the House. The person telephoning avoided disclosing his identity to my secretary.

Last evening when I looked over the Evening Star my gaze fell upon the single paragraph I have asked unanimous consent to include in my remarks. It is from the column of Frederick William Wile, and is captioned "Run-Around at Agriculture," and as I have personally had the same experience with a Bureau at Agriculture, the fact a columnist had this experience and wrote about it, publishing same on the very day of my most recent experience, prompted my unanimous-consent request.

RUN-AROUND AT AGRICULTURE

Have you ever tried to telephone someone at Republic 4142, the Department of Agriculture? If not, there's an experience ahead of you. Secretary Wallace's bailiwick has such a reputation for giving 'phone callers (and occasionally visitors) the "run-around" that orders were once issued to stop the buck-passing practice. This column recently tried to reach an employee in the Department library. Switchboard imparted that Agriculture has five libraries. Then the name of the desired party was given. For some weird reason, the call was switched to "Retirement," whatever division of the bucolic branch that may be. "Retirement" had never heard of the person. Patience personified, the columnist asked for "Personnel." That division was presently heard in animated conversation over something or other, except the business in hand, for the ensuing 3 or 4 minutes. Then suddenly a voice out of the somewhere chirped: "This is the Maloney Concrete Co." Nothing daunted, we tried Agriculture's number all over again, and asked for the Secretary's office. Thereupon an obviously competent young woman named Martin came to the rescue. She identified the particular library required and established the contact instantly. It's costing Uncle Sam $1,550,000,000 this year to maintain Agriculture activities in Washington, including 11,935 employees. As Mr. Wallace's domain extends over 1,532,066 square feet, the cost per square foot works out at about $1,000. If the Department's telephone service is any criterion, it's no wonder the farmer still needs relief.

Mr. Speaker, as these experiences are the same to all Members, it is doubtful that this notation in the RECORD will have other effect than lifted eyebrows and tilted noses in snobbery on the part of the petty subalterns gracing the Federal pay roll. It is hoped Members may note it, and analyze the smug complacency of these employees of the classified civil service, whose only objectives are, first, to be placed; secondly, to advance in grade; and lastly, attain retirement eligibility, but retention on indispensability, having reached that point. All Members should remember this when asked to favor legislation to freeze people into the classified service by noncompetitive examinations, especially before voting for H. R. 960, when that time arrives.

Completing the Record on Agricultural Exports and Imports

OF

HON. BEVERLY M. VINCENT

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. VINCENT of Kentucky. On page 56 of the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD there appeared a statement by the gentleman from New York, Representative DANIEL A. REED, in which he compares exports of selected agricultural commodities or groups of commodities for the first 8 months in 1939 and in 1938, and then, without further analysis, hastily concludes that instead of expanding foreign markets for our agricultural products the reciprocal trade agreements program seems to be working in reverse. Data showing the foreign trade of the United States for the first 9 months of 1939 were released a few days ago by the Department of Commerce. Anticipating a new burst of partisan political attacks on the reciprocal trade agreements program by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] or some other opponent prompted by the same desire to confuse the unsuspecting farmers and turn them against the administration's efforts to provide profitable markets for farm commodities both at home and abroad, I feel that the farmers of our country are entitled to a full exposition of the facts.

Impartial critics recognize that a comparison of trade data covering only a few months cannot yield a fair appraisal of the trade-agreements program because such comparisons do not show the effects of special factors which tend, in a short period of time, to direct the flow of trade. One example of this is the abnormal nature of foreign trade throughout most of 1939. Foreign nations facing the grim necessity of preparing for national defense were obliged to make unusually large purchases of certain industrial products which can be used for defense purposes. The necessity of these purchases reduced the power of our foreign customers to buy certain other types of American products—notably agricultural products—and their purchases of these commodities inevitably declined. Moreover, the nightmare of the impending probability of war made it necessary for the nations likely to become involved in armed conflict to press expansion of home agricultural production in order to insure adequate food supplies and thereby cushion, as much as possible, the first impacts of general hostilities. Other special factors operated, at the same time, within this country. A degree of industrial recovery took place, increasing the demands of American industry for imports of agricultural raw materials, and the ability of our industrial population to buy imported specialty and luxury products.

These were only some of the factors—totally unrelated to the trade-agreements program and entirely beyond the effects of that program, which were influencing the short-term trends in agricultural exports and imports that the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] has tried to ascribe wholly to the trade-agreements program.

The gentleman would have us and the farmers of this country believe the obvious absurdity that breaking down foreign trade barriers against our agricultural exports has had the effect of curtailing our exports.

Moreover, any comparison of trade data which seeks to appraise the effectiveness of the trade-agreements program in restoring our foreign markets should be made against the stalemated condition of our foreign trade which the program was designed to correct. It is not reasonable to expect that even the lowering and removal of barriers to our exports can bring about, year after year, progressive increases in volume of our exports of every commodity to every trade-agreement country, regardless of what other factors may be operating. In other words, comparisons should be made with some preagreement period such as 1933, the last full year preceding adoption of the trade-agreements program.

The following table makes such a comparison:

United States exports of agricultural products

Export items	9 months ending September—		Increase (+) or decrease (−) 1939 over 1933
	1933	1939
Cotton, unmanufactured	$250,917,000	$121,964,000	−$128,953,000
Tobacco, unmanufactured	40,723,000	61,317,000	+20,594,000
Corn	1,705,000	12,253,000	+10,548,000
Wheat	1,900,000	34,199,000	+32,299,000
Wheat flour	9,929,000	18,534,000	+8,605,000
Oil cake and meal	5,262,000	6,595,000	+1,333,000
Vegetables and preparations	5,628,000	11,863,000	+6,235,000
Fruits:
Fresh	17,315,000	26,336,000	+9,021,000
Dried and evaporated	10,296,000	13,069,000	+2,773,000
Canned	10,776,000	17,635,000	+6,859,000
Meat products	17,512,000	24,392,000	+6,880,000
Lard, including neutral lard	25,115,000	15,397,000	−9,718,000
Dairy products, except fresh milk	3,054,000	5,104,000	+2,050,000

It will be noted that there were only two decreases between 1933 and 1939. There were extraordinary domestic and foreign reasons for this condition. Space here does not permit a detailed analysis of the reasons which caused this decrease. Suffice it to say at this time that trade agreements had nothing whatever to do with this decrease.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] called attention to an increase of imports in so-called agricultural products during 1939 over 1938. The following table lists in detail the items which account for the increase in value of imports of agricultural commodities:

United States imports of agricultural products

Import items	9 months ending September—		Increase 1939 over 1938
	1938	1939
Crude rubber	$94,163,000	$119,074,000	$24,911,000
Raw silk	61,372,000	75,489,000	14,117,000
Cocoa	16,548,000	20,330,000	3,782,000
Tea	13,345,000	15,154,000	1,809,000
Hides and skins	19,133,000	33,671,000	14,538,000
Flaxseed	14,656,000	15,738,000	1,082,000
Unmanufactured wool	12,590,000	34,595,000	22,005,000
Wheat for milling and export	968,000	4,464,000	3,496,000
Total of items listed above	232,775,000	318,515,000	85,740,000
Total agricultural imports	711,647,000	794,700,000	83,053,000

Note that whereas the total increase in value of imports of the items listed in the table is $85,740,000, the increase in value of imports of all agricultural commodities was only $83,053,000. These figures mean that total imports of such commodities as can be and ordinarily are produced in this country—even in quantities not large enough to meet domestic requirements—actually decreased in 1939 as compared with 1938. On the other hand, the increase that did occur was in imports of things farmers and city consumers alike want and buy, and in things that our industries, undergoing a measure of recovery in 1939, demand as raw materials.

It may be recalled that in 1932, under the effects of Smoot-Hawleyism, that so-called import balance, concerning which the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] seems so concerned, was only $4,000,000; but it will also be recalled that farm cash income in 1932 was only four and one-third billion dollars. Compare this situation with 1937, when our agricultural import balance of $800,000,000 was the highest in recent years and farm cash income was eight and one-fourth billion dollars. Does the gentleman from New York hope to make farmers believe they were better off in 1932 than in 1937?

When trade data showing imports of agricultural commodities are examined in more detail, and when the increase in imports in 1939 over 1938 is analyzed in terms of commodities, we discover—contrary to the impression that the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] most obviously wishes to leave in the minds of our farmers—that the increase is nearly three-fourths accounted for by increases in imports of such so-called agricultural commodities as crude rubber, raw silk, cocoa, and tea, which must come altogether from foreign countries; the more than one-quarter is accounted for by commodities which under normal domestic requirements must be imported to supplement deficient domestic supplies.

Since the opposition has raised criticism against trade agreements during this special session, called for the purpose of neutrality legislation, we might briefly review some of the factors which made this program necessary. If we bear these facts in mind, they may help us when the present European conflict ends to avoid the committing of the same errors in our foreign commercial policy that we committed after the last war and by which we helped to deepen and lengthen the world-wide depression.

After the cessation of hostilities in 1918 the countries of Europe were prostrate and devastated. They faced a hard reality—the necessity for reconstruction. The United States had developed and expanded its agricultural and industrial productive capacities during the war to meet the exigencies of the conflict, and we occupied a favorable economic position to profit from the demands of reconstruction.

During the 1920's we protected our interests in foreign markets by loaning to foreign governments billions of dollars, which they could use to pay for our farm and factory products. To that extent we postponed resolving the manifold economic problems that had arisen from the war.

As life gradually returned to normal, the countries of Europe set about recouping their former foreign markets in order to stabilize their economies and rehabilitate their productive capacities. In our own interest we should have employed our national energies at that time to aid in restoring international commerce to normal peacetime levels. Our post-war tariff acts, however, failed to recognize the far-reaching, disruptive effects that excessive rates of duty would have on our own domestic prosperity. The Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act, adopted in 1930, enacted sweeping measures to prevent, as far as possible, foreign merchandise reaching our markets. Foreign countries quickly retaliated with measures restricting American products in their markets. Result: Collapse of our export trade and economic misery throughout the Nation.

Congress in 1934 adopted the Trade Agreements Act, authorizing the President to seek, through negotiation with foreign countries, to restore our foreign trade by mutual undertakings to reduce trade barriers. Because of the obvious success of the trade-agreements program in helping to restore our foreign trade, opponents of the program tend to forget the extent to which trade with foreign countries declined after 1930 and glibly blame the program for failure when the slightest fluctuations occur. In their misguided zeal, opponents never lose an opportunity to misrepresent the effects of the program.

OF

HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

REMARKS BY HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER, OF MAINE

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following remarks I made at a banquet meeting of Hancock County Council of the American Legion in honor of the new State commander, Llewellyn C. Fortier, at Ellsworth, Tuesday evening, October 10, 1939:

The American Legion now faces its supreme test. Whether or not those who fought the last war will be able to guide America clear of the current world convulsion is to be determined by the events of the next few months.

None love war less nor love peace more than the veterans of the World War who suffered disillusionment in France.

More than 100 veterans of the World War in the Congress of the United States are resolved to keep America in the path of peace for the good not only of America but of the world. This was the mandate of the American Legion in its great convention at Chicago.

Experience is still the best if not the only teacher. The veteran is desirous that his son shall fight only in defense of America. For that defense he is most anxious that America shall be adequately prepared.

The leaders of the American Legion in State and Nation in this year of crisis face a challenge and an opportunity to help America in its hour of greatest need. Let a love of America and of American institutions purge every lesser hate and fear. This alone will suffice to unite America to go forward to its manifest destiny under the guidance of Almighty God in accordance with the Legion creed.

War Prices and Winter for W. P. A. Workers Debunk Democratic Brag of Relief Cuts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, immediately after the new wage schedules for the Work Projects Administration became effective on September 1, 1939, under General Order No. 1 of the W. P. A., I began to receive numerous protests and appeals from the people of my district. I venture to say that every Member of Congress whose constituents have been affected adversely by the new wage scale has been getting similar protests and appeals from their own districts.

Many of the protests against the sharp slashes in already meager wages have come to me from other citizens besides the W. P. A. workers, who are affected directly by the cuts. Many other citizens have appealed for a restoration of the wage cuts as a matter of simple justice. This readily can be understood after a glance at the schedule of wages fixed for Blair, Centre, and Clearfield Counties, Pa., which comprise the Twenty-third District of that State. I wish to place in the RECORD at this point a comparative table of the old and new wage schedules:

Pennsylvania

	Unskilled		Intermediate	Skilled	Professional and technical
Blair County, Altoona, 82,054 (25,000 to 100,000):
Wages established by Executive order in 1935	B	A $52.00	$60.00	$75.00	$83.00
Prior to Sept. 1, 1939		57.20	66.30	75.40	83.20
New rates	$48.10	52.00	62.40	81.90	84.50
Centre County, Bellefonte, 4,804 (under 5,000):
Wages established by Executive order in 1935		40.00	45.00	55.00	61.00
Prior to Sept. 1, 1939		53.30	61.10	70.20	78.00
New rates	39.00	42.90	52.00	67.60	68.90
Clearfield County, Du Bois, 11,595 (5,000 to 25,000):
Wages established by Executive order in 1935		44.00	50.00	63.00	69.00
Prior to Sept. 1, 1939		53.30	61.10	70.20	78.00
New rates	42.90	48.10	57.20	74.10	76.70

Naturally, I began an inquiry into this matter at once. One glance at that table would convince anyone of the sound reason for the protests and the real merit of the appeals. No one could examine that wage schedule without finding glaring inequities, if not downright injustices in it. Not the least shameful is the fact that unskilled W. P. A. workers, who receive the least pay, suffered the deepest cuts and therefore bear relatively the greatest hardships.

Since that time I have striven without success to bring about a fair adjustment of the wages in my district. That effort has led to an extensive exchange of correspondence and a series of conferences with high officials of the W. P. A. in Washington and in Harrisburg, Pa.

In fairness, I must say that the officials of the W. P. A. with whom I have conferred on this matter and with whom I have corresponded have shown for the most part a sympathetic attitude and a disposition to cooperate. But a sympathetic attitude and a disposition to cooperate is not enough unless satisfactory results are forthcoming. Results are what count with W. P. A. workers and their needy families.

Primarily, of course, the inequitable and unjust wage cuts go back to the amendment to the relief bill, sponsored by the Democratic gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER]. That amendment was designed to penalize the more prosperous States of other sections. As it has turned out, I understand the manner in which the law has been administered has resulted in no gain for the South, as it was intended. I understand that protests against the new W. P. A. wage schedules are just as vigorous in the South as they are in other sections of the country. But the fact that this ill-conceived provision proved to be a boomerang does not help W. P. A. workers anywhere.

The mere fact that the Tarver amendment was enacted into law is one of those strange things that happen once in a while in Congress. When it was presented to the House, during consideration of the relief bill last summer, the House voted to kill it. And, naturally, when the House votes decisively against a proposition, we all assume it is definitely dead. But on this matter, we reckoned without the Senate.

After the House had killed the amendment, the bill went to the Senate for action. While the measure was in the Senate, the old Tarver amendment was slipped back into the bill and it was in there when the measure passed the Senate. But the Members of the House were denied another chance to kill the objectionable amendment. If they had been given the opportunity to vote again, that provision to penalize W. P. A. workers never would have been written into law.

When the relief bill came back to the House with the Senate amendments, including the Tarver amendment, there was no opportunity to vote on any separate provisions of the bill. The vote came on the straight question of accepting or rejecting the entire bill. It was a question of "whole hog or none." Members of the House were placed in the position of taking the bill just as it stood, Tarver amendment and all, or voting against all relief. The question came on June 30, the last day of the fiscal year. On that day, all appropriations for W. P. A. activities stopped. If the House had defeated the conference report, W. P. A. workers all over the country would have been out of jobs. The funds to pay them were exhausted. There was no time to offer a new bill and get it through the House and Senate. So the Members of the House did the only thing they could in the face of those circumstances. They accepted the report and the Tarver amendment became law the moment the President signed the bill.

Out of that provision grew General Order No. 1 of the Work Projects Administration, effective September 1, 1939. That order provides "that the schedule of monthly earnings applicable to any county shall be based upon the 1930 population of the largest municipality within the county." That provision is not an act of Congress. It is the act of the W. P. A. Administrator at Washington, but it operates under the law and is just as binding so far as W. P. A. workers are concerned.

After some correspondence and conferences with W. P. A. officials in Washington, I was advised to take up this question of adjusting the wage schedules for the twenty-third district of Pennsylvania with Col. Philip Mathews, State administrator of Federal Work Projects Administration at Harrisburg. I did so at once.

Colonel Mathews' reply was delayed pending the decision of Col. F. C. Harrington, Commissioner of the Work Projects Administration at Washington, on Colonel Mathews' recommendation for adjustment of the warge schedules for certain areas in Pennsylvania. Colonel Mathews' recommendations were rejected. I want to quote from Colonel Mathews' letter to me, in which he explained what he had recommended and what was rejected. Colonel Mathews stated:

> In requesting adjustments in the schedule of earnings, I based my recommendations on the 1937 population of certain municipalities as estimated by the State planning board, which are the most recent figures available.
> Recommendations were made only in those instances where the estimated 1937 population of the largest municipality indicated a sufficient growth to warrant the inclusion of the county in the next higher wage group. I have received advice from our Washington office that after thorough consideration of my recommendations it was deemed inadvisable to authorize the proposed adjustments.
> In making my recommendations for adjustments in earnings, it was necessary to limit the substantiating data to population figures, since the method of applying the Schedule of Monthly Earnings contained in General Order No. 1 to wage areas is predicated exclusively on population figures.

General Order No. 1 prescribes the following Schedule of Monthly Earnings for Wage Region I:

	Wage class
	Unskilled		Intermediate	Skilled	Professional and technical
Area: Counties in which the 1930 population of the largest municipality was—	B	A
Group 1. 100,000 and over	$52.00	$57.20	$68.90	$89.70	$94.90
Group 2. 25,000 to 100,000	48.10	52.00	62.40	81.90	84.50
Group 3. 5,000 to 25,000	42.90	48.10	57.20	74.10	76.70
Group 4. Under 5,000	39.00	42.90	52.00	67.60	68.90

The schedule of earnings shown in group No. 2 above was applied to Blair County, since Altoona, the largest municipality within the county, had a 1930 population of 82,054. Clearfield County (Du Bois population, 11,595) was placed in wage group No. 3. Centre County (Bellefonte population, 4,804) was placed in wage group No. 4.

Prior to the effective date of General Order No. 1, the State administrators were authorized to make adjustments to the schedule of monthly earnings within the range of 10 percent, and by virtue of this authority the schedule of monthly earnings for the unskilled and intermediate wage classifications were increased by 10 percent in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. It was also within the authority of the State administrator to adjust the schedule of monthly earnings on the basis of contiguity of counties. Under this authority Clearfield and Centre Counties were included in that group in which the 1930 population of the largest municipality was 25,000 to 50,000. Blair County was not contiguous to a higher-rate county and, therefore, was left in that group in which the 1930 population of the largest municipality was 50,000 to 100,000.

The above-mentioned adjustments were rescinded by general order No. 1 and, to a great extent, accounts for the reduction in the schedule of earnings for these three counties.

Very truly yours,

PHILIP MATHEWS,
State Administrator.

As I have stated, Colonel Mathews was disposed to do what he could to ease the lot of the W. P. A. workers in Pennsylvania, but his recommendations were turned down by the W. P. A. Commissioner in Washington. After that there was only one thing left to do in my effort to bring about an equitable, fair, and just adjustment of the wage scale—that was to make a direct appeal to the President. The Work Projects Administration is an independent Federal agency coming directly under the President. He is the real "boss." So I wrote to the President, as follows:

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I wish to appeal to you on a matter of vital concern to several thousand men, women, and children in my congressional district and many more thousands throughout the country.

My plea is for an equitable adjustment of the new wage scale for W. P. A. workers in Blair, Centre, and Clearfield Counties, Pa., which comprise the Twenty-third District of that State. I most earnestly urge you to take the steps necessary to bring about a review of General Order No. 1 of the Works Projects Administration, effective September 1, 1939, to the end that W. P. A. workers may be paid wages more in keeping with the actual cost of living.

While the welfare of the people of my district is my primary concern, I am informed that W. P. A. workers in other Pennsylvania districts, as well as those in other States, are suffering from similar inequities as a consequence of the wage schedule, and a general adjustment may be as desirable as it is urgent.

Without burdening you with more than the essential details, I may say this matter has been taken up "through channels." It seems that you, Mr. President, are the "court of last resort," and therefore I appeal to you now to take the proper action to save the people dependent upon W. P. A. wages from unnecessary hardships this winter.

Acting upon protests and appeals immediately after the new wage schedules became effective I presented the matter to W. P. A. officials at the Washington office. I was advised that the initiative for a review and recommendations for any modifications must come from the State administrator. Accordingly, I presented the matter to Col. Philip Mathews at Harrisburg, Pa. After some delay, occasioned by the consideration of his recommendations for adjustments in the schedules for several Pennsylvania areas, he advised me that they had been rejected as "inadvisable" by the Washington office.

I am unwilling to permit the matter to rest there and take this next and last step in the hope of preventing any further hardship among the W. P. A. workers and their families during the winter. I feel sure that no one could examine the wage schedule fixed for my district without finding glaring inequities, if not injustices in it. No one who responds sympathetically to human needs could fail to be moved by the fact that relatively the deepest cuts and the greatest hardships fall upon the lowest-paid workers. And many of those who receive the least have the most mouths to feed.

As you know, General Order No. 1 provides: "That the schedule of monthly earnings applicable to any county shall be based upon the 1930 population of the largest municipality within the county." I contend it is impossible to justify the relatively wide difference in wages paid to W. P. A. workers in the three counties in my district when there is only a slight difference in actual living costs.

As I have told W. P. A. officials in Washington and in Harrisburg, I realize the magnitude of the task imposed upon them and the difficulty of making hasty and sweeping changes in wage schedules to meet the requirements of an ill-conceived provision of the new law, which I opposed in the House. Nor do I question the good faith of officials in attempting to fairly administer an unfair and unwise provision of the law. While my efforts to bring about adjustments in the wage scales have met with sympathy, the results have been wholly unsatisfactory.

Let me also impress upon you the fact that the new wage schedules were fixed before the outbreak of war in Europe and became effective simultaneously with the beginning of hostilities. The outbreak of war, as you have noted, produced a sharp rise in food and clothing prices. This is shown by reports of the United States Department of Labor, as well as a study of living costs made by Pennsylvania State College in my district.

Winter, which already has begun in my district and all the Northern States, imposes further hardships on these W. P. A. workers, whose already meager wages have been slashed. Most of these families depend upon their gardens for a part of their food supply and that source is no longer available. Fuel for heating is another seasonal drain on their small wages.

In view of the fact that Colonel Mathews' recommendations for adjustments in the schedule of earnings, based upon the 1937 population of certain municipalities as estimated by the State planning board, which are the most recent figures available, have been rejected by the Washington office, it now appears to be necessary to establish a new standard. It seems to me that a less rigid and less arbitrary standard, which takes into consideration the actual cost of living, might be established within the law.

I feel sure, Mr. President, that you would prefer to have inequities adjusted by administrative action rather than permit them to continue until Congress can correct them by legislative action.

Very truly yours,

JAMES E. VAN ZANDT.

Now, I await the President's reply. He is indeed the court of last resort in this matter just now. If any action is to be taken at this time, the President must take it. Congress can do nothing until it convenes for the next session in January, in the midst of the snows of winter.

It is unfortunate but true that in the past we have witnessed relief—human misery—used as a political football. I must await the final word before I am prepared to say that relief again has become a political football. I make no such charge now, but I do insist upon justice for the W. P. A. workers and their needy families in my district. Justice in this case consists of W. P. A. wages somewhat in keeping with the cost of living in the Twenty-third District of Pennsylvania—not wages fixed by false and arbitrary standards.

Now, let us take a look at the cost of living since the outbreak of the war in Europe. Mr. Isador Lubin, the Commissioner of Labor Statistics of the United States Department of Labor, has advised me that his bureau is following the weekly price changes in Pittsburgh and 11 other large cities for 15 staple foods. Mr. Lubin stated:

> Prices of certain food items advanced sharply following the outbreak of the war in Europe. This was particularly true of sugar, flour, lard, and navy beans. These price advances were maintained until the third week in September when the upward trend was largely checked. After September 26 there was a slight downward trend, which has leveled off. Almost no change was reported during the weeks ending October 17 and 24, and a slight decline was reported for the week ending October 31.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that when a W. P. A. worker goes to the grocery store to buy the necessities of life for himself and his family, he does not need a statistician to tell him how much prices have gone up since the outbreak of war in Europe. He can tell that by taking one glance at his slim pay envelope when he goes in the store, and he does not need an adding machine to count the pennies when he comes out. And if his children are weak and sick he does not need a doctor to tell him their condition comes as a result of a starvation diet.

I wanted to be fortified with the facts, so I asked President R. D. Hetzel, of the Pennsylvania State College, to have a survey made of living costs in the vicinity of State College, Pa., since the outbreak of the war. I wish to incorporate that statement in my remarks. It follows:

STUDY OF LIVING COSTS IN THE VICINITY OF STATE COLLEGE SINCE THE OUTBREAK OF THE EUROPEAN WAR, 1939

(Prepared by A. H. Reede and C. S. Wyand, under the direction of C. W. Hasek, of the department of economics of the Pennsylvania State College)

Spectacular rises in both wholesale and retail prices of certain commodities early in September have led to much speculation as to how general the upward movement was and its influence on the cost of living. Unfortunately, no agency collects data on costs of living for the State of Pennsylvania as a whole and the figures of the United States Department of Labor and the National Industrial Conference Board are for selected cities, only a few of which are in Pennsylvania. In any case, they have as yet released no figures on the war period, for much time is required to tabulate an immense volume of data, weigh it, and reduce it to index numbers. The chief reason for the selection of a city as the unit to be analyzed is the tendency to marked variations in prices and living standards. It has proved possible to secure considerable information on prices at retail in State College, and prices at wholesale in Centre and adjoining counties. The data secured allow a reasonably close estimate that the cost of living in this area has risen about 2 percent, and the wholesale price level nearly 10 percent. The weighted average of retail food prices, the most sensitive items in the cost of living, has risen about 2½ percent. Rents have naturally shown little tendency to rise, since they are arranged in advance, commonly for a period of a year. Light and fuel prices have remained constant, and retail prices of clothing have changed but little. It appears, then, that the war has so far produced little bouyant effect on living costs in this section, and that retail prices have tended as usually to respond slowly if at all to changes in wholesale prices. If the war continues, however, and anticipated shortages of certain materials are realized, the upward movement of wholesale prices will be accelerated, and a sharp rise in the cost of living may be expected.

Changes in the cost of living are relatively easy to determine. Ascribing these changes to specific factors is much more difficult. Thus the price of canned pears increased about 10 percent from September 1 to November 1, due in part to the fact that the 1939 crop of California pears was poor. Since pears tend to soften in the can, carry-over of a portion of the 1938 pack could not compensate for a short crop. Hence prices rose. Conversely, the retail price of lamb dropped between September 1 and November 1 largely through a softening of consumer demand for such meat. Other items registered similar changes that could not be ascribed directly or indirectly to the war.

On a few items price changes may reflect wartime forces. Thus canned pink salmon and canned corned beef registered increases of 20 and 25 percent respectively in price after September 1. All canned meats rose an average of 10 percent in the same period. It is probable that the extensive use of such foods in the army diet contributed to these price changes. Wool, silk, and leather registered the sharpest increases of all of the items in the clothing category, a fact which probably has military significance. Other categories in the cost of living show no price increases that are clearly attributable to the war. Fuel prices have remained constant, as have rents, and the principal sundries.

The price of numerous foodstuffs (e. g., pork, sugar, and certain cereals) did rise rather sharply during the first 2 weeks of the war, but these increases have been in large measure, offset by a subsequent softening of prices. As of November 1, the retail price of food was no more than 2½ percent above the pre-war level, whereas the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics reports about a 4½-percent increase in the average cost of food between August 15 and September 15. The subsequent decline to current levels apparently took place soon after the middle of September and was virtually completed by October 1.

As might be expected, wholesale prices have risen more sharply than retail prices, the increases in food prices ranging from 5 to 65 percent and averaging 10.4 percent. The weighted average increase, however, is only slightly over 6 percent. Outstanding increases affected wheat flour, up 23 percent; pink canned salmon, up 65 percent; potatoes, up 50 percent; and prunes, up 20 percent. Thus far wholesale prices of dairy products have remained remarkably stable, as have most fresh fruits. Reflecting the increase in the wholesale price of wool, silk, and leather, articles of clothing prepared from these materials are being sold to retailers at prices from 5 to 10 percent higher than 2 months ago. As is true of retail items, the movement of wholesale prices is spotty, but the rising tendency is both sharper and more general. It is still too early to say whether this tendency will continue or to what extent it will gradually be reflected in higher living costs.

Most assuredly, as the European war continues—and some military experts say it will continue for anywhere from 5 to 10 years—the demand for food and all sorts of war materials is bound to create shortages. When demand exceeds supply, there always is a sharp rise in the cost of living. And in that event, it will require more than mere threats to prosecute profiteers to protect W. P. A. workers and their families.

God forbid that the lot of the W. P. A. workers and their families should grow any harder than it is now, but if the cost of living continues to go up I want the responsibility for this relief program and the refusal to fairly adjust W. P. A. wages to rest where it belongs. That is squarely upon the bosom of the Democratic Party. I would hesitate to inject a partisan note into the debate on such a nonpartisan issue as relief if partisanship had not been tossed into our faces by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], the Democratic leader in charge of this bill. The gentleman from Virginia is an amiable man. He points with partisan pride very gracefully. Let me quote what he had to say when he called up the conference report on the relief bill in the House on June 30 last.

First, the gentleman from Virginia boasted about the refusal of the Federal Government to carry the entire relief load. He then took a crack at some of the chiseling by the theatrical industry, which never should have been permitted to rebuild itself with Government subsidies. Then he bragged about the tardy recognition of the fact that too many highly paid W. P. A. officials would be disappointed because the bill did not carry large increases for them as it usually did. He crowed over the fact that at this late date, his committee had finally cracked down on the unlimited traveling expenses of high-paid W. P. A. officials and administrative expenses also had been cut somewhat. Then he pointed with party pride. Here is what the gentleman from Virginia said:

But this bill will please and it will be heartening to millions of American citizens who are willing to have their Government stretch forth a helping hand to the needy and unfortunate portion of our citizenship, but who wants to see it done in a decent and clean way, and, if I may speak to my own side of the aisle for a moment and be pardoned, I hope I may not be unduly partisan: This bill will please hundreds of thousands of Democrats who have taken great pride in the accomplishment of their party, which stepped into a great emergency and helped the unfortunate people of this country. They can in the future look forward to its program, hold up their heads, and not find things of which to be ashamed.

Naturally, this partisan appeal brought applause from the Democratic side of the House Chamber.

Just the other day, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] announced with complete assurance, that there would be no funds appropriated at the next session of Congress to take care of any deficiency for W. P. A. workers and their families. In other words, no matter what happens, no matter whether the current funds are exhausted long before the end of the fiscal year on June 30, 1940, there will be no deficiency appropriation for the W. P. A. Yes, sir; the gentleman from Virginia pronounced the bill as perfect when it came back from the Senate with the Tarver amendment restored. Come what may, no further funds can be expected for the W. P. A. until after the first of July 1940. Come war, come higher living costs, the administration stands pat on its relief program. No matter what happens through the hard winter, the spring, and the first months of summer, the gentleman from Virginia and the Democratic administration stand pat on the present relief program.

I quote from a Washington dispatch sent out by the United Press on November 7. The headline states, "No deficiency bill for W. P. A., says WOODRUM." Now I quote the body of the story:

Chairman CLIFTON WOODRUM, Democrat, of Virginia, of the House deficiency appropriations subcommittee, served notice today that there would be no deficiency appropriation for the Work Projects Administration at the next session of Congress.

"It is thoroughly understood that there will be no deficiency incurred and no reason whatever for asking for any deficiencies next session."

WOODRUM also indicated that his committee's investigation of W. P. A., which resulted in stringent restrictions in the appropriation bill for this year, would not resume its investigation until January. He said the investigation now was quiescent, although field men have been sending in reports.

WOODRUM disclosed that W. P. A. officials had been warned that they were expected to "make ends meet" on their current appropriations, and that they had agreed to keep within their budget.

Expanding business, it was pointed out, should help W. P. A. to accomplish this job. Last month several hundred thousand additional workers were employed by industry. This should lead, deficiency committee members believe, to a lighter relief load.

W. P. A. was given the full Budget allowance of $1,475,000,000 for this year after a bitter legislative fight last spring between Congress and President Roosevelt. Restrictions were written into the program to make the money go as far as possible.

Now, let us see what has been happening in Pennsylvania under the W. P. A. Let us see what the failure of the W. P. A. in the State to maintain the quota allotted has cost the Commonwealth. That story can best be told by the Honorable Howard L. Russell, secretary of the department of public assistance, at Harrisburg. In a letter to me on November 3, Mr. Russell stated:

The Honorable JAMES E. VAN ZANDT,
House of Representatives, Congress of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. VAN ZANDT: The failure of the W. P. A. Administration in this State to maintain the quota allotted to Pennsylvania has caused us much concern. For the months of August, September, and October, Pennsylvania has been allotted a quota of 150,000 workers.

There is attached hereto, a report by weeks, showing the quota and the number of persons employed on the W. P. A. by weeks, as well as the extent to which the program has been undermanned. This report covers the period from August 1 to the last report submitted by the W. P. A. on October 25.

The last column on the report shows the potential cost to the State due to the failure of the W. P. A. to maintain their quota. The total of figures in this column amounting to $1,491,039.28 is an estimated figure and is subject to some variation. During August and September, the average weekly relief payment to general assistance cases amounted to $7.33, and we used this average payment in our estimate. The interpretation of this potential cost to the State is based on the fact that we retained on the State relief rolls the number of cases shown in the column "Undermanned" that could have been assigned to the W. P. A. program.

The W. P. A. administration in Pennsylvania has advanced several reasons for their failure to maintain their quota of 150,000. They state that the order to enforce the 18-month lay-off did not erach Harrisburg until August 5. There were approximately 65,000 to be laid off due to this ruling and we were given to understand that this had to be completed by September 1.

It was also stated that the W. P. A. administrative allowance was cut 47 percent, which necessitated reducing the number of area offices in the State from 16 to 10. In this curtailed position they succeeded in getting the required number of men laid off, but did not make replacements fast enough by using other available relief recipients to maintain the quota.

The report shows a marked decline in the number of persons employed on the W. P. A. during August and on September 6, the low point was reached when only 117,169 persons were employed. The trend then rises, but it is noted that on October 25 the employment shows 145,177, which is still 4,823 below the quota.

The Governor appointed a committee of five to represent the State in cooperating with the W. P. A. in an endeavor to reach the quota and maintain it. This committee was appointed in August and found that there were enough projects approved to provide employment for enough men to fill the quota, and there were plenty of available employable workers on the State relief rolls.

When the W. P. A. failed to make very much progress during September in reaching the quota, the Governor appointed another committee of three to investigate the conditions in certain counties where there seemed to be no valid reason for the failure of the W. P. A. to have the required number of men working on projects operating and those projects approved but not started. This committee was comprised of two men representing the Commonwealth and one man representing the W. P. A.

The committee investigated the conditions in Luzerne, Lackawanna, and several smaller counties in that vicinity. The conclusions reached after this investigation showed no valid excuse for the failure of the W. P. A. to have the number of men at work who were needed to man the projects. There were sufficient projects and a large number of available relief recipients who could have been assigned.

Sincerely yours,

HOWARD L. RUSSELL, Secretary.

I now wish to present a table furnished to me by Mr. Russell, which tells the story in figures:

Oct. 25, 1939	150,000	145,177	4,823	35,352.59

Judging from those figures, it would seem to be necessary for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to always maintain some form of a vigilance committee to stimulate the W. P. A. toward maintaining the quota. The State certainly should not have to assume this responsibility now when the records show that in November 1938 the W. P. A. employed 286,000 persons. At the present time the State relief rolls are much larger but the W. P. A. seems to be encountering great difficulty in placing only half of that number of persons on work relief projects.

There also is much speculation as to what the W. P. A. will do about increasing the Pennsylvania quota and the number of persons actually put on relief work during the winter months when the quota for the entire country increases. The W. P. A. figure for the country is 1,800,000 persons for November. That jumps to 2,000,000 for December. If W. P. A. gives the Commonwealth its just quota and fills it, from 16,000 to 20,000 more persons in Pennsylvania should be eligible for W. P. A. in December. Pennsylvania should be due for another big boost in January and in February when the total for the country reaches 2,400,000. But will Pennsylvania get a fair share of relief and work relief? We will have to wait and see.

Now let us return to the gentleman from Virginia again. We have heard him claim all the credit for the Democratic Party with respect to this relief measure. Now let me cite some of the things we tried to do to perfect this measure. If the Democratic majority in the House had not voted down the amendments I offered, relief would have been extended to some entirely worthy persons, who really are entitled to relief, but who are ineligible under the present bill.

First, let me say that Republican votes in the House maintained in the bill the $1,475,000,000 requested by the President. The President said that was sufficient, and I for one voted for the full amount. I also voted for proposals to give more money to the rank and file of W. P. A. workers. And I voted for the proposals to keep the high salaries of the head men of the W. P. A. within reason and to hold down their unlimited expense accounts.

Two of the amendments I offered would have served to cushion the hardship to persons dropped from the W. P. A. rolls. One provided 60 days' notice to persons before severance from the service. That was voted down by a storm of "noes" from the Democratic side of the House. An amendment to give 3 weeks' notice before severance met a similar fate.

Another amendment offered by me would have given small-home owners an opportunity to save their homes from going under the sheriff's hammer for delinquent taxes.

Americanism begins in the American home. The American home and its owner is entitled to the protection of the Government he upholds. Under my amendment, a small percentage of W. P. A. jobs would have been available to home owners who were unable to pay their taxes. Half of their wages would have gone for their back taxes. But the gentleman from Virginia and his Democratic cohorts had the bit in their teeth, and that amendment was voted down.

In another amendment I sought to protect the World War and Spanish-American War veterans, their wives and widows, but to no avail. My amendment, supported by several veterans' organizations, which were denied an opportunity to appear before the Appropriations Committee, also was voted down.

I was among those who supported amendments to protect veterans and persons of 45 years and over in their W. P. A. jobs. Those also were lost in another storm of Democratic "noes."

It may seem unkind to keep harping on the genial gentleman from Virginia, but the gentleman asked for it. He gloated over the fact that the bill "provides every dollar that the Democratic President has asked for relief." He boasted of the fact that the measure had the support of the Democratic leader, Mr. RAYBURN, of Texas, and even the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, Speaker BANKHEAD.

These gentlemen had better make the most of their self-congratulations now, for the W. P. A. workers and their families may not be so quick to forget the winter of their discontent. It is doubtful whether these gentlemen will receive any very hearty congratulations from W. P. A. workers on reduced pay and scanty rations due to rising living costs during the long, cold, cheerless winter.

For myself, I am proud to have been on the losing side. The W. P. A. workers and their families were entitled to the warm-hearted, generous support given them by Republican Members who offered liberalizing amendments, only to be swept aside by the Democratic steam roller. If I had not gone down to defeat with that loyal band, I would not be able to say, "I kept the faith with those who needed help the most."

ADDRESS BY HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER, OF MAINE

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address I delivered before the State convention and aeronautical field day of the American Legion at Oshkosh, Wis., August 13, 1939:

The first four words of the preamble of the constitution of the American Legion contain the cornerstone for sound recovery. "For God and country we associate ourselves together." Filling again our churches we shall breathe the spirit of the pioneers. We went to war to find the peace that passeth understanding.

History is strewn with the wrecks of great civilizations that have perished when they have deserted their early God. Materialism run rampant is the story of the soviet way of life. At every point it is opposed to the democratic concept of the individual as more important than the state.

The life and spirit of each citizen of a democracy is recognized as the supreme concept. The difficult process of reconciling the clashing of individual wills is yet essential if democracy is to be preserved.

We have passed through the valley of the shadow. We have tottered on the brink of the abyss. But there are now not lacking indications that America is once again upon the march to a better way of life.

No sacrifice of the essential principles of democracy is to be required. No totalitarian ideology of any character needs, in America, to be enthroned.

The veteran sometimes seems brusque in dealing with symptoms of civic unrest. When a comrade wanders unwittingly in range of an enemy machine gun it is sometimes necessary first to slap him down and later to make explanations. Such at least is the spirit in which the veteran seeks to preserve the precious heritage of America.

Freedom to voice honest convictions embraces no tolerance of dishonesty and stealth. The purity of our motives must ask the pardon for any suggestion of excess in zeal.

Love of God and country may well guide and guard America in the future as in the past. The Mayflower may still continue constant on its voyage toward the port of an ordered liberty and a religious freedom that distinguishes America in the history of the world.

ADDRESS BY HON. RALPH O. BREWSTER, OF MAINE

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address I delivered before students of Beal Business College at Bangor, Maine, on October 25, 1939:

The Communist Commissar Molotov and Herr Hitler insist that democracy has failed. They maintain that the intricacy of modern mechanical civilization necessitates a centralized control.

The answer is not to be found in reciting either the Declaration of Independence or the Constitution of the United States but in demonstrating the capacity of a self-governing democracy to put 10,000,000 idle Americans back to work.

The answer is to be found in opening once again the door of opportunity to 10,000,000 young Americans who in the last decade have poured out of our schools ready and willing and anxious to get a job.

This is the challenge to Americans, old and young, and the next decade is going to furnish the answer as to whether the American system is going to continue as a better way of life.

Putting our domestic house in order is the first step in a sound national defense. This winter is going to witness a great campaign of preparedness and in that campaign we shall give consideration not only to adequate armaments but also to proper education of our youth in both mechanical and technical lines.

Making our internal economy function so that there is work for willing hands and that our distributing mechanism is not clogged by lack of purchasing power is everywhere recognized as imperative.

A balanced Budget and a pay-as-you-go policy must soon be achieved if our national economy is not to break down. It is the responsibility of young people with a business education and with a great stake in the future of America to give the attention necessary to think this problem through.

Congress responds most readily to the intelligent interest of those who are active in community affairs.

The opportunity for young Americans to pioneer in solving the problems of this new day within the framework of our democratic institutions is as thrilling as any situation that has tested the spirit of our ancestors in the 10 generations that have brought America to its present position of preeminence among the nations of the earth.

America has a great destiny as it enters its golden age. That destiny is going to be realized in full measure in this generation by solving our domestic problems and keeping America at peace.

Neutrality Legislation

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. KING

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, October 27 (legislative day of Wednesday, October 4), 1939

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. WILLIAM H. KING, OF UTAH

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I had intended to discuss the bill under consideration and had prepared some notes and memoranda as a basis for such discussion. However, so much time has been consumed in the consideration of the bill, I shall content myself by requesting that there be inserted in the RECORD a copy of an address which I delivered over the radio entitled "Neutrality, by Law and in Practice," through the National Broadcasting Co.'s radio system on the evening of July 17 of this year. But since then the bill which I then discussed has been slightly modified, but is essentially the same as the measure now under consideration. I also ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD a statement which I prepared as the basis for an address dealing with the broad question of neutrality.

The matter to be printed in the RECORD is as follows:

NEUTRALITY, BY LAW AND IN PRACTICE

Conflicting views are dividing the American people with respect to the course which our Government should pursue in its international relations.

It is insisted by some that the present Neutrality Act shall be continued. Others insist that it shall be strengthened, and by that they mean that greater restrictions shall be imposed upon our Government and upon our nationals. Others urge that the present Neutrality Act has proven most unsatisfactory and will endanger the peace of our Republic; and, under these circumstances, the demand is made that the Neutrality Act of 1937 be repealed and that our Government chart its course by the principles of international law.

There are those who contend that international law is inadequate to meet situations which international conflicts, particularly if they eventuate in war, develop. In other words, they insist that international law, notwithstanding its importance and pervasive influence, is silent in periods of stress and storm and when the fires of war are lighted.

DISAPPROVED OF DEPARTURE

I was opposed to the Neutrality Act of 1935, which was amended by the act of 1937. I believed it to be a departure from the traditional attitude of our Government with respect to the principles of neutrality. I insist that it was not in harmony with the principles that were announced by Washington and Jefferson, and by which this Nation was governed in its international relations during the intervening years.

The act, as I believed, not only was a restriction upon our Government, but it was an interference with the freedom and liberty of our nationals. I believed then, as I believe now, that it was unneutral and would therefore prove not only unsatisfactory, but might provoke international criticism and possibly international difficulties.

Certainly it was an attempt at isolation, and was a surrender of American rights for which the act itself afforded no compensation.

Briefly, the act provides that the President, whenever he shall find that a state of war exists between two or more foreign states or that civil strife of sufficient magnitude exists in a foreign state, shall proclaim such fact. Thereafter, it shall be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States to any of the belligerents; to purchase, sell, or exchange bonds or other obligations of any belligerent government; to arm any merchant vessel of the United States beyond the extent necessary to preserve discipline aboard such vessel; or for any citizen of the United States to travel on any vessel of a belligerent. It was further provided that the law should not apply to American republics engaged in war against a non-American state, if the American Republic was not cooperating with a non-American state in such war.

RESTRICTED ARMS SHIPMENT

The so-called cash-and-carry provisions of the act, which expired on May 1 last, prohibited the shipping in American vessels of articles, specified by the President, in addition to arms, ammunitions, or implements of war, and allowed their export in foreign ships only after all right, title, and interest had been transferred to a foreign government or agency.

It is to be noted that the act is not to be operative unless and until the President shall find that a state of war exists. In other words, it is entirely within the discretion of the Chief Executive to determine whether or not arms and munitions may be sold to a country engaged in hostilities, whether or not a citizen may purchase bonds of such a government or travel upon her ships. The dangers that inhere in this unfettered discretion—with no standard of any kind to guide the President in making the determination, with no definition of what constitutes a "state of war," with no requirement that a state of war be recognized even though it in fact exists—become apparent.

Criticisms have been leveled against our Government because of its interpretation of the Neutrality Act, as well as the interpretation which has been placed upon its provisions. It is believed by many that under the principles of international law a different course would have been required by our Government in dealing with the Spanish situation and in its dealings with the devastating and tragic war which Japan has waged against China.

Certainly conditions which have existed since the Neutrality Act of 1937 have demonstrated the futility of legislating in advance to meet conditions in a turbulent and changing world.

EITHER ALTERNATIVE RISKY

The discretion resting with the Executive, it is believed by many, is inimical to the interests of the American people and may result in placing the Government in an unneutral position. The moment hostilities occur in any part of the world the President must determine whether or not the resources of this Nation shall continue to flow to the belligerents. If an embargo is laid, it is inconceivable that it would affect both belligerents alike, and the country disadvantageously affected would have grounds for complaint, whereas if the act is not invoked the other belligerent might be injured. Even though the President exercises this discretion solely for the welfare of the United States, the belligerent that is adversely affected can look upon it only as a hostile act on the part of this country. Placing the Government in such an unneutral situation, where it will likely incur disfavor from one side or the other, cannot be cited as an aid in keeping America out of war.

The regulating of foreign commerce is one of the powers entrusted to the Congress by the Constitution, and any discretion to be exercised should be by Congress and not by the executive branch of the Government.

The difficulty in applying the act is further aggravated by the time element. Should it be invoked at the moment the first shot is fired, or should there be an interval during which peace negotiations may be attempted, or until it appears that the war will be of such proportions as to present a threat of involvement to America? If the act be not invoked at once, a belligerent might quickly obtain sufficient arms and other essentials before it is applied. The delay will be regarded by the other belligerent as a hostile and unneutral act toward it.

Another ground for my opposition to the act is that it offers an incentive for aggressive nations to declare war against other nations that are less prepared and less aggressive, for so long as there is peace, arms, ammunitions, and implements of war may be secured from the United States and some other nations. Walter Lippmann states that by repealing the Neutrality Act we shall take away from them (referring to Germany and Italy) the hideous inducement to start a war in order to deprive their opponents of supplies that they can obtain only as long as there is no war.

INFLUENCES WORLD TOWARD PEACE

In the troubled conditions prevailing throughout the world today this Republic, with its great material and moral strength, should lead in the movement toward international peace and friendly cooperation among the family of nations. Dedicated to the high principles of justice and freedom, it has ever sought the settlement of disputes by pacific means. The spiritual force of this democracy has elevated the concept of government in many lands, and its devotion to peace has had its influence upon the world.

The act of 1937 is illogical and, in my opinion, should be repealed. There is no basis for placing an embargo on the sale of arms, ammunitions, and implements of war, and not including in that embargo other articles, such as oil, food, and clothing, that are as essential, if not more so, to the conduct of modern warfare. Surely there is no greater risk in shipping armaments than there is in transporting other articles needed in carrying on military activities. The arbitrary distinction is unfair to certain nations, and, again, places the United States in an unfavorable situation. Industrial countries do not need arms and munitions if they can import the raw materials with which to manufacture them; but some countries that are primarily agricultural are in dire need of the manufactured articles themselves; and their embargo, while permitting the exportation of scrap iron and other essential raw materials from which they are made, operates to the disadvantage of nonindustrial nations.

In this troubled world condition, legislation in advance concerning our foreign policy cannot be planned intelligently. Our short experience under the present act has demonstrated the impossibility of formulating a rule that will guide the United States in international conflicts that may arise. We cannot foresee who will be at war, or the cause of the same. We cannot divine the issues that will be involved, nor can we give expression to what the public sentiment in this country will be 6 months from now, or 1 year, or 5 years.

SURRENDERS CONCEDED RIGHTS

The act of 1937 is a surrender of conceded neutral rights even before war breaks out. In the event of a conflict, having surrendered certain rights, I fear we shall have to enumerate rights which we intend to hold fast. Belligerents are not concerned in the details of local legislation. They are at war, and admit restraints grudgingly—restraints imposed by the principles of international law, as they have come to be accepted through centuries of warfare.

There is no justification for the surrender of our neutral rights. There is no requirement for such self-denial. Dulles and Armstrong, in their work entitled "Can We Be Neutral?" have pointed out the source of a great deal of the confusion in formulating a neutrality policy. In restricting our shipping and giving up other rights during times of war, what is our purpose? Are we trying to keep out of war or are we trying to prevent war? If the former, then clearly we should surrender these rights only when there is danger to our peace in not surrendering them; that is, during a war when the belligerents have substantial control of the sea. If this is the purpose, it is obviously futile to legislate on the subject in advance of knowing whether the peace interests of the United States are at stake.

If the purpose is to prevent war, concerted action by several great powers would be the only effective curb. The futility of one nation attempting a partial or general embargo against belligerents in order to prevent war has been demonstrated throughout history. It is too clear for argument that if the United States refuses to sell certain articles to countries at war, others producing the same articles will gladly supply the warring nations. The restriction on our own trade is merely a deprivation for the benefit of our foreign competitors. And it must be remembered that Americans, by nature, will oppose restraints upon their rights and freedom unless the justification therefor is clear.

But, regardless of the purpose, so long as the ultimate end is to avoid being drawn into a war, the Neutrality Act presents dangers to American peace interests; and any neutrality measure must be carefully and skillfully drawn because of the almost certain danger of its operating as an unneutral measure.

The United States has not often been a belligerent, and, therefore, has been primarily interested in determining the rights of neutrals, particularly with reference to matters affecting trade and commerce. This has resulted in announcing, as an international policy, the freedom of the seas. Our Nation has been foremost in championing the freedom of the seas, and I am unwilling to favor a policy, adopted in the act of 1937, which, in effect, is an attempt to seek isolation by the abdication of our rights at sea, if not on land.

It is apparent that we cannot be isolated from all possible dangers of international conflicts, and no policy of alleged neutrality should be adopted which narrows the rights of our country or weakens international law. The rights of neutrals and belligerents should rest on recognized principles of the law of nations. This does not mean that treaties should not be entered into between nations for the purpose of promoting peace and widening the opportunities for trade and commerce and cultural and economic development.

It is impossible to determine what course governments will pursue in the near or in the distant future. When the World War broke out, neutral nations did not know, and neither did the belligerents, what the lines of battle would be, or what instrumentalities of death and destruction would be employed. The announcement by a nation of the course it will pursue in the event of an international conflict probably would prove impotent in averting war or preventing the nation in question from being drawn within the field of international conflict. If our Nation announced to the world in advance what our policy would be, and what inhibitions will be imposed upon our Nation and upon our nationals, it might prove advantageous to aggressive nations now preparing to enter the field of war. A unitary declaration of policy may give belligerents an opportunity to formulate their plans with reference to the announced policy of the nation making such a declaration. Moreover, the unilateral announcement of a policy imposes some restrictions, so that when the conflagration comes it would be prohibited from adopting different plans and different regulations when the exigencies of the situation demanded a change. To alter the announced plan might prove advantageous to one or more of the belligerents, to the disadvantage of other belligerents, and thus subject the United States to the charge of favoring one belligerent over another.

As indicated, in the event of an international conflict, regulations which one nation may promulgate, hoping to prevent its being drawn into the conflict, would not be accepted by belligerents if advantages might be derived by ignoring them, so that if we surrender, as the law of 1937 provides, some of our neutral rights, we need not expect that belligerents will be more constrained to regard conceded neutral rights or national territory.

FREEZES UNITED STATES ACTION

As I have indicated, the act of 1937 seeks to deprive Americans the freedom of action in the event of a foreign war. It serves notice in advance that our Government will draw no distinctions between the violators of international law and the victims of such violation.

I opposed the act of 1937, believing that it would encourage armament at home, if not abroad, and that the American people would be called upon to increase their already heavy appropriations for military and naval purposes. This prediction has come true, and the appropriations for so-called preparedness, which will be made by the present Congress for the next fiscal year, will exceed $2,000,000,000.

It is believed that the American people will not collaborate with other nations to enforce peace. Accordingly, we should not approve legislation which ties the hands of the Government and thus deny us an opportunity to act for our own best interests if and when the fires of war spread throughout the world.

For the reasons stated, and others that might be mentioned, the neutrality legislation, in my opinion, should be repealed, and we should take our stand upon the foundation and precepts of international law.

It is contended, however, that these principles were violated during the World War, that treaties and solemn pacts are ignored and broken with impunity, and that therefore international law is dead.

Assuming the above contention to be true, if the alternative to international law—the Neutrality Act—offered a guaranty of peace, there would be validity in the argument that we should rely upon the Neutrality Act to keep us out of war; but since it is admitted that there can be no guaranty of peace, it becomes our duty to follow such a course as will give the United States the most security in its intention to remain at peace. The grave complications that are likely to result from tying the hands of Government by declaring a policy in advance of circumstances that cannot be predicted, may not be minimized. I have adverted to a few of the embarrassments that the United States will face in the event of an international conflict if our course is charted by the act of 1937, and these will tend to involve the country in war far more than situations that may arise under the rules of international law.

WORLD LAW STILL LIVES

I cannot subscribe to the view that the law of nations is dead. Dr. John Bassett Moore, the eminent authority on international law, who was for 6 years a judge of the Permanent Court of International Justice, insists that it has not ceased to exist merely because its principles have been violated. He declares:

"It has never heretofore been supposed that when belligerents violated international law they believed that they were destroying it or depriving it of its obligatory force."

Has it ever been suggested that, because people are from time to time murdered, there is no criminal law forbidding homicide? Is it not true that the laws exist whether the criminal is apprehended and punished or not? A violation of municipal law has never been regarded as a destruction of that law; and so it is with international law.

International law is recognized among all nations. It is a term applied to that body of rules and regulations of states and other bodies possessing international personality.

It is more than policies adopted in diplomatic relations; it finds expression in comity among nations; it is a part of the law of the land, recognized by the courts and by judicial tribunals in all civilized nations. It has been implemented and strengthened by agreements, treaties, customs, and concrete and ordered dealings among states. International law was recognized in ancient Greece, but it declined under the Roman Empire. It has been said that the birth of international law is traceable to the Peace of Westphalia.

MULTILATERAL IN APPLICATION

It is not unilateral but multilateral, and is in part due to compromises among nations under the terms of which selfish state laws or international policies are modified in the interest of better relations among nations. It is a recognition of the importance of higher moral standards among nations and a broader spirit of tolerance and justice. Grotius, and other great writers on international law, sought to mitigate the spirit of fierce nationalism and to secure a recognition by nations of what might be called "natural justice." They sought to modify the doctrine of exclusive sovereignty of nations and to bring about a certain amount of collectivity of action among nations. Various international conferences have been held for the purpose of codifying international law and formulating broader policies for the promotion of world peace.

There is an international law of war and an international law of peace. The former was the more important in the first centuries of the development of international law, and it developed rules of neutrality, including blockades, contraband, visits and search, and policies to mitigate the sufferings of the people in time of war. Prize courts were developed under international law and arbitrations of international disputes encouraged and recognized. As nations advanced in civilization, a higher ethical concept was developed, and the principles of international law became more firmly established and more generally recognized.

More recently efforts have been made to develop international machinery for the purpose of outlawing war and to make more effective the principles of international law. In the evolution of the principles of international law, emphasis was early laid on impartiality toward belligerents, but more recently methods are being sought to determine the justice of war and who are the aggressors. Neutrals are to aid in bringing pressure upon wrongdoers.

This undoubtedly is a modification of the accepted principles of international law, and may effect the accepted principles of neutrality. International law is concerned not alone with international conflicts, but it has to do with international peace and the promotion of those policies which make for world peace.

DOES NOT COMPEL SILENCE

And so the view is being developed that international law, with its emphasis upon neutrality, does not compel neutral nations to be silent in the face of assaults by powerful states upon weak and unoffending peoples. In other words, in determining the course to be pursued by neutrals, consideration is being given to the question of justice and ethics and morality which arise or grow out of international conflicts; and the conduct of belligerents is being weighed by neutral nations, and the course of the latter is influenced by the verdict as to which of the belligerents was the aggressor, and whether its conduct calls for universal condemnation. This, as I have indicated, may result in profound changes in the law of neutrality and affect the application of international law.

Bainbridge Colby, former Secretary of State, has stated:

"It is a well-known principle of international law that the measure of a nation's neutral obligations is to be found in the rules of international law and nowhere else. As a result of centuries of wars, this group of principles was evolved by which belligerents and neutrals achieved some reasonably definite guides to the conduct of their reciprocal relations on land and sea. The adoption of these rules has been regarded throughout the civilized world as a victory for civilization over brute force, for law over anarchy."

International law is comprised of a great body of custom and precedent, of treaties and conventions, of weighty opinions and authoritative court decisions, of arbitral awards and instructions issued by civilized nations for the guidance of their diplomatic and other organs, of historic state papers, and the texts of historians and jurists.

WARNS OF ECONOMIC LOSSES

Mr. Colby warns that the principles of international law, despite the opinion in some quarters that it is a thing of the past, may nevertheless be tellingly invoked to show the unneutrality of the act of 1937. "If we assume the nonexistence of international law because of its unpunished violations during the last war, we may find ourselves confronted by it in all its rigor when our conduct is challenged under its ancient and established rules. We may find that we have consigned our shipping to disuse, transferred the trade of our citizens to foreign competitors and undermined fatally our domestic economy, discovering too late that our new and ingenious formulas have not worked as expected."

The rules of international law may not prove in themselves a source of complete protection. But we shall know what our rights are and we can determine in each instance what degree of self-restraint or forbearance we can afford to practice.

Our present Neutrality Act does not lend to the strengthening of the principles of international law; rather, it is a renunciation of those principles. This Nation, occupying a high place among the countries of the world, with its material and spiritual strength, should take the lead in bringing about international cooperation and peace.

Mr. President, I intend to vote for the pending measure, but will do so with considerable reluctance, because it contains some provisions with which I am not in accord and which I believe will prove disadvantageous to our country. The President in his message calling Congress into extraordinary session points out the importance of repealing the embargo provision of the act of 1937. I share the view of the President and believe that I am warranted in supporting his position, even though in so doing I must vote for a bill which contains provisions which I regard as harmful to our country.

As indicated in the radio address to which I have referred, I was opposed to the act of 1937, and particularly to the embargo provisions found therein. The present measure repeals the act of 1937, including, of course, the obnoxious embargo provision. Many of the provisions of the act of 1937 are found in the pending bill, and though I was opposed to that act, the measure before us, notwithstanding its objectionable features, has sufficient merit to justify me in voting for it. The pending measure, if enacted into law, will prove disappointing to the American people. It will be but a slight deterrent to the United States being involved in the present European conflict. It certainly does not immunize the United States against the flames of war and will not insulate this Republic against the dangers of war. It will prevent some of the dangers which will attend the European conflict, but it will not, in my opinion, afford any guaranty that this Republic will be immune from the war germs which are now infecting many countries. Certainly the bill before us can scarcely be called a neutrality act; it is, rather, a measure to repeal some of the accepted principles of international law, and to that extent to shackle the hands of this Republic.

It is a waiver, if not a repeal, of many of the accepted and well-established principles of international law—principles for which this Republic contended for more than 150 years; it is a unilateral attack upon international law, and, as I have indicated, is an attempt to repeal vital and important principles of the law of nations which have received the approval of civilized nations. We propose to enact a law under the terms of which we abandon or waive rights which have been molded into canons of international law and which have been a bulwark for the protection of states weak and strong. It is proposed that we enter upon this course upon the belief that it will prevent the United States from being drawn into the maelstrom of the present world conflict. As stated, it abandons what our country has always contended for—freedom of the seas and the right of the Americans to engage in trade and commerce with the nations of the world. It will drive many of our ships from the seas, close American ports, throw tens of thousands of persons out of employment, and injure, if not destroy, at least for the present and the near future, American shipping.

The losses, not only to American shipping but to American people, will aggregate billions of dollars, and, in my opinion, the Federal Government will be asked to reimburse shipping interests to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars.

As stated, by statute we propose deliberately to limit our maritime trade and to drive scores of American vessels from the seas, with consequent losses, not only to the owners of ships but to millions of American citizens. The American people will learn that this Republic, with all of its wealth, is not self-contained, that it is still a part of the world, and that its interests, material as well as moral and spiritual, are intertwined with the interests of millions of people in all parts of the world. A great sacrifice is being demanded of the American people and, indeed, of the peace-loving peoples of the world in the passage of this bill. And yet so great is the desire of the American people to prevent the United States from being drawn into war they apparently are willing to make the great sacrifice which I have so imperfectly indicated.

Some of the notes which I indicated it was my purpose to present in this address deal generally with the importance of international law and its application to the present world situation. Though I shall vote for the bill, I shall criticize some of its provisions as unsound and unnecessary to the realization of the desired objective.

The proposals for neutrality are nothing more than suggested methods by which a common end is sought, namely, to keep the United States out of war. A discussion of legislation designed to keep us out of war is futile unless it is agreed at the outset that the country's prime objective is to remain at peace. The overwhelming sentiment of our citizens and the administration is such that it is safe to assume, as a common ground for the consideration of this legislation, that the United States wants peace.

Peace being the objective, the question remains: What course can best be pursued by our Government to keep it free from involvement in a foreign war? Is it best that we absolutely prohibit the shipment of arms and munitions to belligerents? Should a general embargo on all goods be applied? Is the so-called cash-and-carry plan sound as an instrument in securing American peace? If so, should it be extended to arms and munitions? Should the United States choose aggressor nations and apply sanctions against them alone? Or are the peace interests of our people best served through having no neutrality legislation at all?

These are questions that should be answered before an intelligent course may be charted. And the logical method of attacking the problem is to consider carefully the advantages and disadvantages of each proposal. For, let it not be misunderstood, the legislation cannot be conceived that will absolutely immunize this country against going to war. Such, in the very nature of things, is an impossibility.

The problem, then, is one of choice. As between the conflicting methods, which is the most likely to assure American peace?

As I have indicated, for 150 years our Government has been guided by the principles of international law as they were developed and received recognition. It is now proposed, as I have stated, to abandon rights which have been written into the law of nations.

It may be said that the so-called neutrality law, as now stated by some supporting this measure, was not known to us before the World War. As I have indicated, we were dependent upon the rules of international law for the protection of our interests as a neutral. Because we were engulfed in the World War, it is claimed by some that in periods of conflict international law is not adequate.

I do not accept this view. Dr. John Bassett Moore, the leading authority on international law of today, insists that international law has not ceased to exist merely because its principles have been violated. He states:

It has never heretofore been supposed, that, when belligerents violated international law, they believed that they were destroying it or depriving it of its obligatory force. It is a maxim of the common law that in the midst of arms the laws are silent; but this does not mean that the laws cease to exist. On the contrary, the maximum merely recognizes the fact that, in an armed struggle, the exertion of force is likely to be carried beyond ordinary legal bounds.

Has it ever been suggested that, because people are from time to time murdered, there is no criminal law forbidding homicide; or that, larcenies are committed, we are no longer to abide by the laws against larceny? And, is it not true that the laws exist whether the criminal is apprehended and punished or not? Indeed, no one will contend that there is no law of contracts simply because contracts have been and are being breached.

A violation of municipal law has never yet been regarded as a destruction of that law. Citizens of the United States have certain rights that are protected from invasion. Life is one of those rights—inalienable under our Declaration of Independence. Yet a person who is murdered is surely deprived of that right. The fact that murderers are at large today is no basis for concluding that there is no law in the United States, or that our inalienable rights are nonexistent.

So it is with international law. It is as binding upon nations and their actions as is municipal law upon nationals. True, there is no enforcing agency such as maintains the integrity of local law; but it is none the less binding. Law—whether State, National, or international—is dependent upon the will of the governed for its existence. As former Secretary of State Bainbridge Colby states:

> It is a well-known principle of international law that the measure of a nation's neutral obligations is to be found in the rules of international law and nowhere else. As a result of centuries of wars, this group of principles was evolved by which belligerents and neutrals achieved some reasonably definite guides to the conduct of their reciprocal relations on land and sea.
> The adoption of these rules has been regarded throughout the civilized world as a victory for civilization over brute force—for law over anarchy. Belligerents had an incentive to observe them in order to hold down claims and to avoid the risk of adding to the list of their enemies; neutrals, in order not to expose themselves to legitimate criticism, damages, and attack, and not to risk plunging their people into a war.

We cannot assume the nonexistence of international law because of its unpunished violations during times of war, or because of its want of a sovereign enforcing power. It is comprised of a great body of custom and precedent, of treaties and conventions, of weighty opinions and authoritative court decisions, of arbitral awards and instructions issued by civilized nations for the guidance of their diplomatic and other organs, of historic state papers, and the texts of historians and jurists.

These constitute the safest guide for our foreign policy. Despite their shortcomings, there is no other code of international conduct and procedure—none that is so embedded in the consciousness and practice of mankind, and which it is impossible to replace with anything better.

Has international law ceased to exist? An answer to this question—and what seems to me to be the only tenable answer—is given by Judge Moore, who served for 6 years as a judge of the Permanent Court of International Justice. His was the honor to preside over an international conference, held at The Hague during 1922–23, to promulgate rules for the regulation of the activities of aircraft and radio in time of war. Parties to this conference were the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and the Netherlands.

Dr. Moore, speaking of this conference in his article, An Appeal to Reason, published in Foreign Affairs for July 1933, states:

> The delegates acted under the instructions of their respective governments. An examination of our unanimous report [which will be mentioned later] will show that it was largely devoted to the definition of the rights and duties of belligerents and of neutrals in time of war, and that it treated as still existing the Land War Neutrality Convention, the Convention for the Adaptation of the Geneva Convention to Maritime Warfare, and the Convention Concerning Neutral Rights and Duties in Maritime Warfare, all made at The Hague in 1907. The idea that the law of neutrality had become obsolete never was broached.
> So far as I am aware, not a single party to the Versailles Treaty or a single member of the League of Nations has ever taken the position that the law of neutrality is a thing of the past. The principal powers in the League have on occasion taken precisely the opposite position. All the judges of the World Court, in the Kiel Canal case, unhesitatingly concurred in the view that the law of neutrality remained unmodified; no one thought of doubting its continuing force. Up to the time of my resignation from the Court, in 1928, no such doubt had been whispered; nor am I aware that any has since been suggested. In the war between Greece and Turkey in 1922, Great Britain decided to remain neutral in the conflict, into which Canada and perhaps some of the other self-governing dominions unequivocally announced that they would not be drawn without their consent. In the statement made in the House of Commons by Sir John Simon, as Secretary for Foreign Affairs, on February 27, 1933, concerning the embargo (soon revoked) on the shipment of arms to China and Japan, Sir John expressly spoke of Great Britain as a neutral government, and of the necessity, for that reason, of making the embargo apply to China and Japan alike. In other recent wars Great Britain has pursued a neutral course. France and other governments have done the same thing. On the recent declaration of war by Paraguay against Bolivia, the Governments of Argentina, Chile, and Peru immediately issued declarations of neutrality, thus showing [as they intended to remain neutral] an intelligent respect for international law, to the literature of which some of their publicists have ably contributed.

As indicating the recognition by the United States and other governments of international law, I call attention to the treaty signed at Washington on February 6, 1922, and ratified by the Senate in March of the same year. That treaty expressly recognizes the force and effect of the principles of international law. France, Italy, Great Britain, and Japan joined with the United States in that treaty, which declares that the signatory powers "desiring to make more effective the rules adopted by civilized nations for the protection of the lives of neutrals and noncombatants at sea in time of war, have determined to conclude a treaty to this effect."

It declares that these rules adopted by civilized nations are the rules of neutrality which have come to be recognized as guides through centuries of war, and are "an established part of international law."

It is not necessary to further indicate the provisions of the treaty, but it is clear that the purpose was to reaffirm the acceptance by the signatory powers to the same, of the vitality and authority of international law.

It is claimed by some that the rules of international law may not be enforced. Though conceding that some belligerents may disregard the obligations under international law, it cannot be denied that, notwithstanding these lapses from the path of duty, international law still remains as a guide and protection to nations and is unimpaired in its authority and power. Experience has shown that the law of nations is judicially administered in the courts, not only of the United States but in all civilized lands. We all know that the courts of admiralty in the United States and elsewhere are in a true sense courts for the administration of the law of nations.

Ex-Secretary of State Colby has said:

> As for the opinion that nations are bound by the law of treaty only and that there is no other law of nations, Lord Stowell rejected it as fit only for Barbary pirates, and I may add that American opinion, whether expressed in judicial decisions, in Presidential messages, and other domestic acts of state, or in diplomatic intercourse, has been invariable in the same sense ever since we became a nation.

Dr. Moore's position in the field of international law and jurisprudence generally is recognized among all civilized nations, and for that reason I bring to the attention of the Senate his clear and unequivocal statements upon this matter:

> I have been wont to remark that international wars will cease when civil wars end. Within the state there is legal organization and sanction beyond anything yet proposed in the international sphere, while the very phrase "civil" implies that the war is outlawed. Nevertheless, when obliged to characterize the civil strife then raging in the United States, our Supreme Court, after observing that a civil war was "never solemnly declared," but became such "by its accidents—the number, power, and organization of the persons who originate and carry it on," learnedly declared that "the laws of war, as established among nations, have their foundation in reason, and all tend to mitigate the cruelties and misery produced by the scourge of war," and that in consequence, "the parties to a civil war usually concede to each other courtesies and rules common to public or national wars." And the Court then adopted from Vattel, renowned for his learning and humanity, this profoundly illuminating passage:

"The common laws of war—those maxims of humanity, moderation, and honor—ought to be observed by both parties in every civil war. Should the sovereign conceive he has a right to hang up his prisoners as rebels, the opposite party will make reprisals; * * * should he burn and ravage, they will follow his example; the war will become cruel, horrible, and every day more destructive to the nation."

I have referred to efforts by unitary action to modify international law. May I add that it should be clear that the duties of neutrality, as well as the rights of neutrals, according to the rules of international law, cannot be expanded or contracted by national legislation, and a nation attempting to avoid entanglement cannot shelter itself under the plea that its own unilateral legislation either permits or enforces acts or omissions not recognized by international law as pertaining to the proper conduct of a neutral.

Though it may be conceded that the law of nations may be violated, we are not justified in assuming its nonexistence. If we adopt that view, our Government might find itself confronted by demands made upon it for the enjoyment of those rights established and guaranteed by the law of nations. Mr. Colby has stated that—

We may find that we have consigned our shipping to disuse, transferred the trade of our citizens to foreign competitors, and undermined fatally our domestic economy, discovering too late that our new and ingenious formulas have not worked as expected.

In my opinion, no public official of standing has ever had the temerity to declare that he or his government were not bound by the law of nations and its principles. The provisions of international law may not prove in themselves, either through a dispute as to their application or through a defiance of them on the part of belligerent states, a source of complete protection. But we shall know what our rights are, and we can determine in each instance what degree of self-restraint or forbearance we can afford to practice.

As I have stated, our Government, for more than 150 years, has followed the principles of neutrality developed under international law. It is said that this form of neutrality provides that neutrals at all times shall enjoy freedom of trade in all commodities with belligerents and the latter similar trade with neutrals subject only to such restrictions as one belligerent may, under international law, place upon another by blockade or otherwise.

As we know, in many periods of conflict nations have maintained their neutral status and continued their peaceful pursuits. Under a different policy of neutrality they have attempted to prescribe rules to determine relations among nations even before it was known or could be anticipated what the conflicts might develop. If I interpret the law of 1937, its provisions were regarded as representing a hazardous departure from the established principles of international law. My recollection is that executive officials indicated that its wholly inflexible provisions might, under unforseeable conditions, have exactly the opposite effect from that which was intended. In other words, the inflexible provisions might drag us into war instead of keeping us out. We cannot close our eyes to the nature and extent of the conflict in Europe. Russia and Germany, with similar ideologies and apparently with ambitions for extension of their territory and dominion, may widen their fields of operation and multiply the engines of destruction upon sea and upon land and in the air. Their efforts for conquest may not be halted or limited by the most conciliatory course pursued by European or other nations, and the enactment of laws by the United States limiting and restricting the rights of its nationals may not restrain the governments referred to from military and naval activities violative of the rights of American citizens.

Our present neutrality law of 1937 is predicated upon the belief that it will keep us at peace where the rules of international law failed us, that the law is calculated to remove the causes that were instrumental in getting us into the last war. It is said that the sinking of the Lusitania—the loss of American lives upon belligerent vessels—was one factor which led us to participate. Hence, the present law forbids the traveling of United States citizens upon belligerent ships. The loaning of American money to the Allies was another factor which it is said contributed to our entering the war. Therefore, the present law forbids such loans to belligerent governments. The sinking of American ships and the destruction of American property were other factors. Under the cash-and-carry plan which has expired, materials essential to war, as listed by the President, could not be shipped to belligerents in American vessels; nor could they be shipped at all while a United States citizen had any right, title, or interest in the goods.

The conclusion is inevitable that our neutrality law is based upon the belief that the loss of American lives and the destruction of American property were the principal factors which led to our participation in the World War. As a result, the act proceeds upon the theory that if the possibility of the destruction of American property and the loss of American lives is reduced to a minimum in any future war, there is less likelihood of our Government's becoming involved in that war. And the bill before us contains the same provision as the act of 1937.

What public opinion in this country decided—what made the original neutrality laws possible as I see it—was a very simple thing. It was that, in view of the great burning we had just had at the roasting of other people's chestnuts, we didn't think that our commercial rights as neutrals at international law were worth fighting for. That as I see it is what the original neutrality laws said and that was all they said.

They were not intended as a way to get us into any war on the earth's surface—for or against anybody. They were the exact reverse of that. They were intended as a sacrifice of age-old rights on the ocean—not to get us into war, but to keep us out of war. They said, in effect, that neither American-owned goods nor American-owned ships shall venture into waters where their destruction or seizure might lead us into war.

In considering this legislation, we must remember the force of man's emotions. Walter Hines Page has said that "A government may be neutral, but no man can be." We all recall that—

Even when war broke out in a region as remote as Ethiopia, the majority of Americans took sides. This was not due to any direct attack upon our national interest; and the fact that many of them favored the Ethiopians was not because the Ethiopian propaganda machinery was more active than that of Italy, or because our material interests were bound up in an Ethiopian victory—quite the contrary.

The plain fact is that our sentiments will become engaged in almost any conflict, especially if it is prolonged and involves general principles in which we are interested. Possibly this shows our naïveté. Possibly it is to our credit. In any event the characteristic is an American one of long standing. We cannot rely for the maintenance of neutrality on the calm and measured judgment of our press and people. Any serious incident which seemed to involve our national honor would find us again ready to fight, despite our devotion to peace in the abstract and despite the activities of peace societies or the churches. (Can We Be Neutral?—Dulles and Armstrong.)

The Neutrality Act is designed to prevent these "incidents"—loss of American lives and property—which will arouse public sentiment in our country to the point of a willingness to fight. It is termed a "Neutrality Act." That this is a misnomer is recognized, since the act, though perhaps neutral in terms, may operate in an unneutral manner. And, it is apparent that so long as the act operates advantageously as applied to nations with whom we sympathize, the American people do not object. It is also true that when its operation will favor a nation that is regarded by us as an aggressor, the policy will break down. No more vivid illustration of this can be cited than the present Japanese-Chinese War.

What, then, are the relative merits of the divergent proposals? Is any one of them better than having no neutrality legislation at all.

WHEN DOES A STATE OF WAR EXIST?

One of the most perplexing problems in the operation of the neutrality law lies in the very act of making the law applicable to particular situations. The present act and all the proposed amendments run into this difficulty. If war is formally declared, of course, there is no problem. But if there is no declaration someone must determine whether a state of war does exist. If Congress is to make that determination, there is no need for a neutrality bill in advance, for Congress, when it finds that the state of war exists, can easily adopt the course that this Nation will pursue in remaining neutral insofar as that particular war is concerned. But, under the present law, and under all the suggested amendments thereto, it is left to the President to ascertain and proclaim when a state of war exists. There is nothing to guide him in making this determination, nor is there a requirement that he find that a state of war exists, even when it is common knowledge that a war of vast proportions is actually being fought.

Prof. Charles A. Beard has criticized the provision conferring discretion upon the Executive; he contends that such authorization is violative of the principles upon which our Government is founded and confers too great authority upon the Executive. Without assenting to Professor Beard's views, the question posed is one of importance considered constitutionally or from other points.

It is the opinion of some that the discretion already vested in the Chief Executive under the Neutrality Act is excessive, and, therefore, there should be no enlargement of discretion such as is sought in some pending measures. I say this with no implication that this discretion would be abused by any Executive, but it is too great a burden to be carried by any individual.

When the framers of the Constitution declared that Congress should have the exclusive power to declare war, I think it was their intention to confide the decision of this momentous issue to the representatives of the people. I doubt if any member of the Constitutional Convention envisioned the growth of the Presidential discretion, or had the slightest realization that the determination of the question of peace or war for the Nation might grow out of Executive acts before Congress had an opportunity to consider or debate the question or even to sense the danger of impending war. Many years after the adoption of the Constitution during the administration of President Polk, we had a painful illustration of the consequences of Executive improvidence in the preliminaries which led to the Mexican War.

I am calling attention to these views merely for the purpose of indicating the difference of opinion with respect to the act of 1937, as well as to the measure before us. Doubtless many believe that the Chief Executive should possess the discretion referred to. They entertain the view that no Executive would abuse such discretion or adopt a course which would be harmful to the Republic.

The futility of advance legislation on neutrality has been clearly shown in the short history of the present act. There were no strong interests opposed to the placing of the act in operation during the war between Italy and Ethiopia. The latter did very little trading with this country, and so it was correctly believed that an embargo placed upon Italy and Ethiopia would not injure Ethiopia, and would injure or, at least, inconvenience Italy, which was regarded as an aggressor by our people. Hence, the act went into operation.

But the hostilities in the Orient presented an entirely different picture, just as every conflict must be different from every other one. American sentiment was strongly in favor of China, and yet the operation of the act would have done her damage while benefiting Japan. Therefore it was not recognized that a war existed.

It is strange that one reason advanced by the proponents of neutrality legislation is that international law slumbers during times of war. The neutrality legislation can be validly attacked upon the same ground; surely it has slumbered during the Sino-Japanese War.

Legislation in advance regarding our foreign policy has been condemned as impractical. Our experience under the present act has demonstrated the impossibility of attempting to establish a rule that will guide our country in every international conflict that may arise. We cannot foresee who will be at war and what they will be fighting for in any given instance. If the act is to be applied in some situations and not in others, where lies the virtue of establishing such a policy? If the Government is to formulate its policy to govern each individual conflict as it arises, what is the reason for promulgating a rule ostensibly to apply to all future troubles, when it is known that the rule will be followed or not, as the exigencies of the particular situation demand? If the act is to be invoked in some wars and not in others, according to whether American sympathies would approve the results accomplished by such action or nonaction, it seems clear that certain nations involved in conflict will naturally regard the affirmative or negative action by our Government as being hostile to them. When we refuse to apply the act the nations harmed by such refusal will look upon it in an unfriendly manner.

It is worthy of note that in determining whether a state of war exists, the time element is brought into the equation. Should the act be applied at the moment the first gun is fired, or should there be an interval during which peace negotiations may be attempted or the policy of other neutrals ascertained? If the act be not invoked at once, one country might be able to obtain arms and munitions and other essential war materials quickly, before it is applied. The delay will be looked upon by the other country as a hostile act toward it.

The very unneutrality of the choice that must be made under the act, and the grave complications that may easily result therefrom are arguments against the neutrality legislation but not necessarily controlled.

THE ABSOLUTE EMBARGO ON ARMS, MUNITIONS, AND IMPLEMENTS OF WAR

An embargo upon all trade with belligerents would meet with strenuous protest by American business interests, as well as by all Americans, inasmuch as it would seriously affect our entire economic system. The sacrifice would be too great, despite the danger to American interests in continuing trade unabated.

But an embargo only upon arms, munitions, and implements of war meets with slight opposition in this country, and for various reasons. The consequent restriction in the munitions industry would not imperil our national prosperity. And then there is the natural abhorrence of death-dealing material which dictates that America should not denounce war as barbarous on the one hand, and on the other supply the nations engaged therein with the means of carrying on the barbarities. Then, too, there is the feeling that if the United States does not sell arms and munitions to countries at war the conflict might come more quickly to an end, especially if other nations follow the course of this country and apply like embargoes.

The argument in favor of an embargo upon munitions, and so forth, lies in the fact that American vessels carrying such articles to a belligerent are likely to be sunk by the other belligerent. The validity of this argument cannot be denied. Other than the likelihood of the loss of American lives and property, however, there is no good reason why the sale of arms should be any different than the sale of other articles which are essential to the conduct of modern warfare. Food, clothing, and raw materials are perhaps more needed today in the successful conduct of a war than are the actual means of battle. It is this fact which no doubt has led some Senators and others to urge the removal of the absolute embargo upon the sale of arms, munitions, and implements of war, and to place them in the same category as other articles essential to a country engaged in war. That is, upon the cash-and-carry plan. The belief is that if the United States has no interest in the ship that carries the goods, nor in the arms, munitions, and implements of war themselves, there is nothing in the mere sale of these articles which will lead to American entanglement. At least, no more so than in the sale of other war essentials.

It has been pointed out that during the World War the list of contraband goods was so extended as to include practically every item of any commercial importance in world trade. Great Britain regarded a great many articles other than arms, munitions, and implements of war as essential in the conduct of the war, and her list of contraband became so large that to observe it would have meant in reality to stop our export trade to the Central Powers. Starving a nation into submission in this day and age would perhaps be far more effective and quicker than to compel her surrender through depriving her armies of guns and shells. It was repeatedly brought out in the hearings before the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee that there is no valid distinction today between arms and other goods which are essential in time of war. These goods being regarded as contraband, there is as much danger to American peace in shipping them as there is in shipping arms and munitions. The arbitrary classification, therefore, would appear untenable under modern warfare conditions.

Nothing in international law prevents neutrals from exporting arms to belligerents. There are reasons why nations should not bind themselves in advance to refrain from such exports unreservedly and in all cases. Many believe that the United States should not in advance surrender all its liberty of action in future wars, and thereby find itself unable to negotiate with other neutral nations to help terminate conflicts.

To the industrial countries of Europe, raw materials are far more important than arms and munitions; and if the United States should place an absolute embargo upon the shipment of arms, such action would not hurt those industrial nations, so long as raw materials could still be shipped. On the other hand, a country that is not industrial, as, for example, most of the South American countries, is in dire need of arms and munitions when faced with war.

The operation of an absolute embargo upon arms and munitions is regarded by many as unfair in that it necessarily favors countries which already have the arms or which can easily manufacture them or buy them elsewhere. It should be remembered that aggressor nations do not "aggress" until they are well prepared, and that an arms embargo is more likely to affect adversely the country which has our sympathies than the other. As stated, it is unfair; it is undesirable, in that the effect will generally be contrary to popular opinion in this country, and the United States should not flatly announce its course in advance, which eliminates this Nation from any negotiations dealing with peace.

THE CASH-AND-CARRY PLAN

The plan is fine theoretically. It has two praiseworthy objectives. Its operation does not prohibit our exports and, at the same time, it reduces the possibility of the sinking of American ships and the destruction of American property. I am unable to perceive in this plan the virtues claimed for it and do not regard it as free from objections.

Under it certain goods considered as essential in war may be sold to belligerents. There is not the devastating effect upon our export trade that would result from an absolute embargo upon such goods. And, in order to prevent destruction of American ships and property, the proposal forbids the shipping of these goods in American vessels; and it also provides that title to the goods must be transferred to a foreign organization or government before the goods leave the United States.

Thus "contraband" that is specified by the President as coming within the terms of the plan may be purchased by belligerents. But they must come and get it in their own ships; and they must take title to the goods before departing our shores, which presumably means that the goods will be paid for prior to sailing. In the event the ship is destroyed by its enemy, the United States suffers no loss; it was not an American vessel nor was it carrying American property.

The plan, in practice, however, must operate to the advantage of some belligerents and to the disadvantages of others. Its policy definitely helps the countries which happen to have the ships and the money. China did not have these, while Japan, on the other hand, having a strong marine fleet and resources enough—at least at the beginning of the war—could have continued to obtain American goods after the plan went into effect. The act, therefore, was not invoked, for its practical effect would have been to embargo China while not hampering Japan. This would have been an unpopular course for our Government to pursue, because American sentiment was very much on the side of China.

Aside from the fact that it is theoretically undesirable for the United States to adopt a policy which in reality helps nations that are strong on the sea, it has been shown that the policy of the neutrality law in this respect will not prevent the United States from doing what the sentiment of its citizens demands.

As Dulles and Armstrong state:

Americans are apt to resist when their liberty is curtailed. In addition, then, to the requirement that our trade restrictions plainly form an essential part of a definite program for keeping the country out of trouble, they must be as modest as possible. A chance to negotiate before embargoes were imposed might be of assistance in keeping them as painless as possible. A mere threat to close our resources to a belligerent country might be so weighty that in order to avoid the danger the country in question would make concessions as regards our trade with the other belligerent or with neutrals (p. 101).

If the neutrality legislation will be invoked, or not, as each particular situation requires, where is the benefit of establishing a neutrality law? It has been said that the declaring of our foreign policy through neutrality legislation is like placing one's hand on the table in a poker game where all the other hands are concealed. This is as undesirable in foreign affairs as it is in poker, and our Government should not place itself in this position, especially when the act will not be a guide in future circumstances that cannot be even imagined at the present time.

General Johnson has said:

I understand that it is being proposed to embargo shipments to Japan to favor China. That seems to me to be a perversion of both essential ideas of this legislation as I think the country understands them—that this law is either for "neutrality" or "keeping out of war."

War has changed tremendously in our time. There was a day when kings fought each other and their people were largely spectators. War was a fencing match or rather a football game between professional teams aiming for the goal of the enemy's capital. Then military arms and adroitness were the principal factors. Prussia against Napoleon invented the idea of the "nation in arms." The World War perfected it. War is now a struggle to the death, not between armies merely but between whole economic systems—an impact of civilizations. The economic struggle has become even more important than the military collision. In 1918 we beat the Central Powers by economic strangulation rather than on the western front.

No nation is blind to this. If, as a neutral, we attempt for any reason to discipline a belligerent nation by economic strictures, we have committed an act of war against her. She will know it poignantly. The world will know it. We shall have entered war. We seem to be proceeding on a theory that we can wage economic war on certain nations and escape the onus of having adhered to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort.

It has been said that we must be careful not to be misled by the ease of formulating abstract programs for the relinquishment of American rights. Such programs may sound satisfactory enough and may even find wide acceptance, until the shoe begins to pinch. But when the time comes actually to try to stop a certain class of exports, whether by moral suasion or by embargo, then we will realize that what is theoretically sound as a war-avoidance policy may be quite unacceptable to hard-pressed agricultural and industrial interests. If that happens, we shall have received one more demonstration that the United States is not yet an economically independent unit, that its prosperity is tied up with the markets of the world, and that voluntarily to step out of international trade may take more fortitude than is possessed by the political powers then in control of our national destinies.

The conclusion must be that—

We should reserve independence of judgment and refuse to commit ourselves in advance regarding our course of action in individual situations.

Hugh Johnson states:

I do not favor legislation that freezes our foreign policy on some attempt to foresee the nature and extent of any war. In other words, I do not like war legislation which comes into being automatically, even though we do not know what a particular war will look like, where it will be fought, by whom, or what seas will be dangerous and what seas safe.

I think the whole country is ready to sacrifice some of its neutral rights in order not to create a situation in which a belligerent can force us to fight by violating them. But I do not see why we should surrender all our sea-borne commerce in order to surrender some neutral rights.

We should have a policy that would leave our commerce unimpaired elsewhere on the globe, and that would permit blockade running to adventurous spirits—and that is a right recognized by international law since the beginning.

There appears to be a good deal of confusion as to what the restriction upon our own trading in our own vessels is to accomplish. Are we trying to keep out of war or are we trying to prevent war? If the former, we should prevent exports in American vessels only where a continuance to do so would likely get us into war. In practically every case where none of the belligerents had substantial control of the sea it would seem that there would be no great danger to the United States in carrying on its regular neutral trade in its own ships. If this test is adopted, it is obviously futile to legislate upon a subject where the legislation will not be needed in every circumstance. In those cases where our trade could safely continue in our own bottoms, such isolated instances of interference as might occur would fully be covered by our adopting a policy of "trade at the trader's risk."

If, on the other hand, we are trying to prevent war, a restriction upon trade should be imposed as the result of concerted action by the United States and the other great powers of the world which are important producers and exporters of the materials essential to war. This, of course, is not at present the policy of our Government; and the futility of one nation attempting a partial or general embargo against a belligerent has been demonstrated. It is too clear for argument that if the United States refuses to sell certain articles to countries at war, other nations producing the same articles will gladly supply the warring nations. The restriction upon our trade is merely a deprivation of our export interests, to the benefit of one of our competitors. The United States should not make this sacrifice of its interests, especially when the continuing of trade in our own ships is not likely to involve the United States in war.

Can we really presume to determine in 1939 what will be the wise policy to follow in any and every international situation which may confront the United States in, say, 1942? To attempt it would be to make, in advance and in the dark, momentous political decisions which might have the effect of changing the map of the world.

There is much to be said in favor of the proposition to allow our trade to continue during times of war, and under the rules of international law, for destruction of American property and loss of American lives will be provided against if our Government and our citizens follow the laws of contraband and blockade. And if the citizens will insist upon taking risks, our Government will be justified, as President Roosevelt did 2 years ago, in proclaiming that such risks will be taken by the traders themselves. It is interesting that this is the position which was taken by President Washington at the beginning of our country.

President Washington, after a full discussion of the matter with his Cabinet, issued his neutrality proclamation of April 22, 1793. This brief and simply worded document does not even mention the word "neutrality," but it is generally regarded by students of international law as a highly important step in the development of a new phase of the doctrine of neutrality. For, instead of emphasizing neutral rights, the proclamation urged that citizens of the United States should with sincerity and good faith adopt and pursue a conduct friendly and impartial toward the belligerent powers, and avoid all acts and proceedings whatsoever, which may in any manner tend to contravene such disposition. Americans were warned that by aiding or abetting hostilities against any of the belligerents or by carrying to any of them those articles which are deemed contraband by the modern usage of nations, they would forfeit their rights to the protection of the United States.

What other incentive is needed to protect the interests of the United States for peace? The proclamation of Washington represented a distinct advance over the previous attitude of other governments toward the duties and obligations of neutrals. And its basic principles have since been generally accepted as the proper code of conduct for nonbelligerent nations in time of war.

President Roosevelt, during the Ethiopian-Italian War, established the same standard for the guidance of this country. After referring to the situation which has unhappily developed between Ethiopia and Italy, he concluded with the following warning:

In these specific circumstances I desire it to be understood that any of our people who voluntarily engage in transactions of any character with either of the belligerents do so at their own risk.

Of this attitude Dulles and Armstrong say:

Some observers who knew what a break this announcement made with the past have said that the American public did not comprehend the momentous decision which lay hidden in that one sentence. Probably this was true. The freedom of the seas now had disappeared not only in fact, it was gone in name also; American trade with nations at war was no longer to enjoy the protection of the American Government; and this loss of what Jefferson had called "inalienable right," what Wilson had called "acknowledged rights," had been accepted by the public almost unnoticed and almost without complaint.

The authors of the book above quoted recommend that this policy become permanent; and they indicate an important fact, namely, that there is no need of legislation in adopting this policy:

We believe that the "trade at your own risk" policy should become a permanent part of American neutrality policy. No legislation by Congress is required. To adopt such a policy lies clearly within the province of the Executive, which is authorized to conduct American foreign affairs. It would be a logical continuation, in the Executive field, of the legislation which Congress in its own proper field of action adopted in August 1935. Nevertheless, if Congress by a bipartisan vote should express approval of this policy, the action would tend to establish it as a national policy rather than as an expedient applied to a particular situation by one administration.

Bernard Baruch, in testifying before the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, while advocating the so-called cash-and-carry plan, indicated that there was a good deal of merit in the proposal to allow American trade in American vessels under the doctrine of trade at the traders' risk. He said:

I believe that certainly in some circumstances we should say to Americans: "Well, if you want to go and take the risk, you can do it, but you sail on the ship and you send those goods at your own peril. The flag won't follow you or protect you." I think we ought to give grave consideration to such an attitude. And especially because of this, sir—suppose the war that we are thinking about in Europe occurs. Suppose we say that the English fleet bottles up the German fleet in the North Sea, and that the Italian fleet is bottled up through the Suez Canal and Gibraltar, and an American says, "I want to take some goods over from San Franfrisco or Los Angeles to Australia"—who are now on the side of England—and he says, "I do not think there are any submarines, I am not afraid of any danger there. Can't I do that?" I think some sort of discretion ought to be given our official policy on this point. That is one step forward toward yours. I do not want to see our American enterprise entirely given up. I do not want to see our liberty of action wholly impaired. * * * I am not certain about it myself. I do not want to advocate it yet; I want to give it a good deal more thought (p. 79).

It is believed by many persons that our Government should take its stand under the rules of international law and play the game with common sense as the problems arise, rather than lay down a rigid rule which all belligerents may take into calculation before the war begins. If one belligerent issues a warning, as Germany did in the last war, that it intended to sink its enemy's ships which it believes are carrying munitions or contraband, and warns neutral citizens to refrain from traveling upon such vessels, the Government would be warranted in taking the position that the citizens knowing of the belligerent's warning assumed risks incident to sea voyages. Our Government should further warn them not to do so, and if they insist upon such travel, they have no right to complain to our Government.

Recurring to the question of the delegation of authority to determine what articles, if any, are to be placed upon the cash-and-carry plan, it has been suggested that this amounts to a regulation of commerce with foreign governments which is in conflict with the Constitution which provides that—

The Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations.

Those who scoff at outright repeal of the neutrality legislation point to the fact that international law is dead. Upon what basis, then, are trade agreements promulgated and upheld? It is said that international law slumbers during times of war. What of the slumbering of the neutrality legislation during the pending war in the Orient? It must be remembered that the compromise of neutrality—whether it be based upon the unitary action of a single nation through legislation, or upon international law principles—must be drawn within two limits. It must afford reasonable protection to neutrals in their commerce; and at the same time allow to belligerents a sufficient freedom for the conduct of warlike operations. These limits canot be settled by one single nation. Nor are they inflexible. They changed during the World War. They will change again in future wars. But the fact of change does not warrant the charge that the change destroys the law.

The compromises of international law regarding commerce with belligerents are in effect today as formerly. The compromises, to be true, have changed, but the fundamental principles are present. The belligerent would like to treat all commerce with its enemy as an unneutral act. But it is too much to expect—and belligerents do not expect—a neutral merchant to accept this viewpoint and to refrain from all commerce after the outbreak of war. International law has been worked out, and the rules define what commerce shall be considered permissible to neutrals. These rules permit—and the rules are as applicable today as they ever were—merchants to carry on with belligerents all commerce which is not contraband nor an attempt to violate a blockade. The neutral merchant or shipowner may not furthermore perform any unneutral service for either belligerent without forfeiting his neutral status.

The resultant of the sum total of these conflicting interests in the course of the centuries has led to the adoption of the so-called law of contraband, blockade, and unneutral service; and to this must be added the important provisions in regard to the determination of what is enemy property, so as to subject vessels and their cargoes to confiscation. These various provisions taken as a whole constitute the law of neutrality. Each one of them was the product of a long historical evolution based upon precedents, which represented in each case a compromise between what the belligerent wished to exact and what his consideration for his own future neutral position, or the possibility of irritating the neutral, inclined him to accept. The products considered to be contraband have constantly changed. They are changing today. But the principles remain. A neutral carrying contraband goods to a belligerent is subject to having these goods confiscated.

Much has been said in favor of the repeal of the act of 1937 and the reliance by our Government upon international law. That argument I presented in the radio address herein presented. It was advanced by Mr. Walter Lippmann, who stated that—

> The only real way to disentangle ourselves is to repeal the legislation and take our stand once more on the principles of international law. This is much the safest course, the most easily defensible, the most consistent with the sentiments and the interest of the American people. If we return to international law, we do not have to intervene in the Far East by changing our policy in the middle of the war. We do not have to challenge Japan at a time when Japan is inevitably in a desperate mood. We shall be able to take the neutral position. We shall not be entangled in the extremely dangerous consequences that would result from applying an embargo in the middle of a war. We shall remove from Japan the provocation and the inducement to sign a military alliance with the axis and to precipitate a world war.

And then he indicates a very important factor, which is rarely mentioned in connection with the operation of the present neutrality legislation:

> In regard to Germany and Italy, we shall be taking a position which is legally and morally unassailable. On the other hand, we shall take away from them the hideous inducement to start a war in order to deprive their opponents of supplies that they can obtain only as long as there is no war. The act of repeal, on the other hand, would not only remove the inducement to strike quick, which we now offer to the axis, but it would be profoundly deterrent because it would be construed as making it possible for the coalition to resists successfully.
> Above all, repeal would protect the United States against finding itself in a horrible dilemma once war broke out. For then, with public sentiment what it is, with America's national interest what it is, we should at the outbreak of a war, after air raids on London and Paris and the overrunning of Holland and Switzerland, find ourselves compelled to refuse arms to the nations that engaged the overwhelming sympathy of the Nation. * * *
> The safest course, I repeat, is to repeal the act and return to the elementary principle of international law. This is the only solution that can still be adopted which is legally neutral and can therefore be defended; it is the only solution which can enable us to escape the worst of all the entanglements of a neutral, the entanglements of changing his policy after war breaks out.

The fact that the decision which the Congress must make is one between relative advantages and disadvantages was clearly shown at the hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. While Mr. Baruch was testifying—pages 66–67—it was stated that if we repeal the neutrality legislation, we "refer back to international law, and are back where we were in 1917, and are in the same danger of involvement as we were in then." This was admitted, and recognized as a disadvantage. But Senator JOHNSON of California pointed out that there are disadvantages to the Neutrality Act—to the provisions of the so-called cash-and-carry plan—which have been indicated above. Then he stated:

> I am not clear on the matter, but I think it is likely that we should go back and we should take international law as it exists today and, if we can, pursue what remedy we have, because under your system (the cash-and-carry plan) you at once get into difficulties with the belligerent nations—those that are not able to come and get and pay for the goods that they take, and the title will then rest as the chairman has said.
> Mr. BARUCH. We want to keep out of war, but I am just wondering. A great many people feel that we have to do something to get away from the position we occupied before the World War, and that is the reason they advanced the present so-called Neutrality Act. The question is, If we go back to where we were, do we take a greater chance than to try a new law?

Senator JOHNSON of California then stated:

> That is right. It is a weighing of the advantages and disadvantages, as you weigh a lawsuit or anything else—are the advantages greater in this sort of thing or that sort of thing? But you do not relieve yourself of pursuing one thought you suggest—of taking sides. That is the obstacle. You take sides by doing that because you know when you are beginning about those things.

The question, then—and such was stated at the beginning—is whether our peace interests will be better served through our returning to international law, not as it existed in 1914 or 1917, but as it exists today, and as it will exist if another war of great proportions breaks out or by adopting and continuing some form of neutrality legislation. In my opinion, our country should not act alone by declaring its policy in advance of circumstances that cannot be predicted. There is no basis for the claim that international law is dead. And, while it is not a guaranty of peace, it does not involve the serious difficulties that are inherent in neutrality legislation.

Farmer Sold Out by the War Lords

OF

HON. ANTON J. JOHNSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. JOHNSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of consideration of the neutrality bill we were told that the repeal of the arms embargo would be a neutral act.

As we drew into the last few days of the debate we were told from the floor of the House a different story, not from one but many Members, that this was a holy war, that this was a religious war, that this was a war against totalitarianism, that this was a war to save democracy. Seems as though we heard that some years back.

So we heed not the lessons from the last war and are ready to announce from the floor of this House to the world that we hate Hitler and want to wipe him from the face of the earth and publicly proclaim our assistance to the Allies.

According to the United Press reports from London, England will immediately purchase $150,000,000 of war munitions from us, but will reduce purchases of farm commodities and other manufactured goods. The war lords will get the cash while the American farmer will see the Allies purchase, probably on credit, from other nations cotton, wheat, and meat products.

Not a neutral nation in the world today is selling war arms and munitions to any other nation at war, yet we assume the great risk of active participation in the great slaughter of human lives by supplying the means for slaughter, including poison gas.

The farmer has been sold out by the war lords.

As I View Our Neutrality Stand

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, November 3, 1939

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, when the second World War broke out in Europe some weeks ago, alarming millions of people throughout the earth, I cast about in my own mind to see what appeared to be the best course, both in general and in detail, for this country to follow, in view of all the circumstances. At that moment I was attending a State American Legion convention at Tucson, Ariz. The news of the declaration of war was only a few hours old; the Legionnaires were singing many of the old songs of the earlier struggle. I gave them my feeling that the emphasis should be shifted from "over there" to "over here." That night in their closing function I reminded banquet guests and radio audience that our thought twenty-odd years ago was—

Over there, over there,
We're going over,
And we won't come back
Till it's over, over there.

Regardless of how well or how poorly we performed that task then, our thought today, in my opinion, should be:

Over here, over here,
We're staying over,
And we won't stop work
Till it's over, over here.

The two devastating wars we have had during the past quarter-century—the military war of 1914–18 and the economic war of 1929–39—have left us forty-odd-billion dollars in debt as a nation and with only a partial victory won. It must, indeed, be a most imperative military need to take us "over there" and thus force us to abandon and lose the economic struggle "over here."

It has been my feeling from the outbreak of hostilities that this country must keep out of war and, in order to do so, I felt that the existing neutrality law should be modified in such a way as to minimize our chances of getting into this war. To that end I felt that, although it hurt, we must remove our ships from certain portions of the open seas, even where, under international law and the freedom of the seas, they should have a right to go. I felt that our citizens should be recalled from abroad and forbidden to travel on belligerent ships or even on American ships in danger zones. I further felt that we must extend no credit to any warring nation, but should sell any and all kinds of goods recognized by international law to the warring nations who could pay cash for them. In this category I would include guns and ammunition and such implements of war recognized by international law, but not poisonous gases and some of the other newer, deadlier means of destruction having no standing in the eyes of international law.

I knew, of course, a change in the so-called neutrality law would be condemned by some as "a change in the rules of the game after the game had started." I have never so regarded it, for a modification was recommended by the President 8 months before the outbreak of hostilities, and the legislative process was begun on it by one Chamber 2 months before the outbreak of hostilities. The completion of it was merely delayed last summer by the other Chamber until the next session of Congress. I knew, of course, that there would be some who would say that the proposed change of existing law would aid those belligerents who control the high seas. Quite true, but the proposed change would be of no greater advantage to England and France than no change at all would be an advantage to Germany and Russia. Since my sympathies are more with England and France than with Germany and Russia, I certainly was not opposed to shifting the advantage. Neither the law as it was, nor the proposed new measure, may be said to be actually and really neutral. Each may be said by lawyers to be technically neutral, but it seems to me that the proposed measure has a greater degree of technical neutrality than has the measure which is on the books.

I am unwilling to pull England's chestnuts out of the fire or to spill American blood to guarantee English or French imperialism, but I have even a greater reluctance to aid and abet the dictators of Europe and to encourage the spread of communism, atheism, and antichristian forces throughout the world. Accordingly I have thought and voted in such a way as seemed most effective to contribute our services in measures short of war toward supporting the forces of world law and order; toward continuing our efforts at home in the great struggle against poverty over here; and especially toward a course that seems most likely to keep us out of war. I do not believe that this bill is so nearly perfect as Senator PITTMAN seems to regard it, but it is beyond my power to change it. It is much better than what we had, therefore it has my support.
